Tories' ovation full of affection

Terrorism will never destroy democracy, the Prime Minister told the final day of the conservative Party Conference in Brighton yesterday.

Party representatives gave her a long ovation, full of affection and relief at her escape from the bomb blast at her hetel.

Two sides in coal dispute 'close'

By Paul Routledge Labour Editor

The day-long effort to find a settlement of the pit strike was adjourned last night until this afternoon, when the miners and the National Coal Board will resume their search for a deal.

The Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (Acas) has put forward its own formula to halt the bitter conflict over colliery closures, and it was swiftly accepted by the National

But leaders of the National Union of Mineworkers responded more cautiously to the package and are understood not to have shifted from their insistence that the March 6 colliery closure programme must be withdrawn as a condition of any settlement of the dispute.

As he left the talks at Acas headquarters in St James's Square, Mr Ian MacGregor, "We are perfectly happy with what our associates at Acas came up with. I think it is up to our NUM friends now."

The Coal Board's original proposal accepted the idea of an independent advisory body to consider an appeal by any mining union on the prospect of closure of any pit. But its role would be "strictly advisory".

Full weight would be given to the advice tendered by this body, but it would not have a veto on pit shut downs. "We will still have the final say," Mr MacGregor said. "We cannot do anything else. That is what the law says."

Asked if the board was abrogating its right to manage by accepting the ACAS formula, Mr MacGregor retorted: Never, never, never.

Officials of the NCB stayed back at ACAS headquarters last night for continuing, informal discussions with miners' leaders long after Mr MacGregor and his deputy, Mr James Cowan, had left. These talks may continue over the weekend, but the NUM national executive is also expected to meet in full session tomorrow.

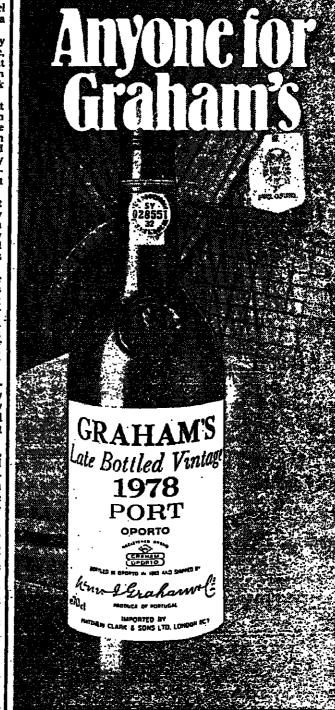

Mr Alan Wilson, General Secretary of the British Association of Colliery Managers, said last night. "There should be chance of a settlement now. They are so close it is unbelievable. I don't know what is separating them.

The winter offensive in Northern targets are usually the softest reland. Earlier the republic's security forces uncovered what they believe was an important bomb making centre in North Dublin when they raided a house and discovered a large quantity of timing devices.

Senior military and police sources were in no doubt vesterday that the device at the Grand Hotel was the work of the Provisionals even before the claim made to the Press Association was passed on to

The IRA claim of responsibility made in a statement to the Press Association offices in Belfast, was also made by an anonymous caller to the Dublin newsroom of RTE, the republic's state-backed broadcasting station. The caller to RTE, who did not give any codeword, told a reporter he would give the message only once.

He then said: "The IRA claims responsibility for the detonation of 100 lbs of selignite in Brighton against the British Cabinet and Tory warmongers.

"Mrs Thatcher will now realize that Britain cannot occupy our country and torture our prisoners and shoot our people on our streets and get away with it.

The attack on Friday morning was not only well reconnoitred and planned, the blast and damage missed the Prime Ministers rooms by a matter of yards, but also shows the Provisionals may have built up a stock of explosives in Britain. They were not relying on any homemade explosive mix but good quality gelignite which did substantial damage.

The call to the Pres Association suggests other targets may also be political or military rather than commercial.

The bomber could already be out of Britain as the Provisionals have often delayed claims in the past until their personnel are safe from the Long history of terror attacks on Tory chiefs

Conservative politicians have bombs were sent to the Prime been among the principal targets of terrorist bombers in Britain during recent years.

Key Members of Mrs Thatcher's cabinet, including Mr Norman Tebbit, have been the subject of unsuccessful letter

In March, 1979 the Irish National Liberation Army killed Mr Airey Neave, Conservative spokesman on Northern Ireland and a close adviser and friend of Mrs Thatcher. He died when a bomb wrecked his car as he drove from the underground car park at the House of Commons. In November, 1981 the Provisional IRA claimed responsibility for planting a bomb at the London home of Sir Michael Havers, the Attorney General Sir Michael and his wife were abroad at the time. Earlier that year letter bombs were sent to Mrs Thatcher and four Conservative MPs.

In March, 1982 an explosive package sent to Mr John Nott, Secretary of State for Defence. was spotted by a suspicious secretary and defused.

Irish Army bomb disposal experts were called in yesterday to deal with a suspect package delivered to Mr Don Tidey, the victim of an IRA kidnap in November last year. Mr Tidey's workplace, the Quinnsworth Supermarket in Dun Laoghaire, Co Dublin, and a three-storey shopping centre were cleared while the package was blown up in a controlled explosion. No one was hurt. An Irish Army spokesman said later that the package contained explosives, and added: "It could have killed."

Mr Tidey has given evidence in court against two men sentenced for their part in his kidnapping. The second convicted man was jailed for three years 24 hours before the package was delivered.

Mr Tidey was held for three weeks in November and December last year in a wood at Ballinamore, Co Leitrim, after he was snatched from his car near his home in Dublin.

Mrs Thatcher said "that the bomb attack on the Grand Hotel was first and foremost an indiscriminate attempt to massacre innocent unsuspecting men and women staying in Brighton for the Conservative conference. Their first thoughts must be for those who died and for those who are now in hospital

But the bomb attack clearly signified more than this. It was an attempt not only to disrupt and terminate our conference, it was an attempt to cripple her clected Government," she said.
She expressed their deep

Mrs Thatcher then turned her attention to the issues which had been debated during the

The Government, she said, had been fulfilling the promises contained in its election manifesto. The Government was reasserting Parliament's ultimate responsibility for controlling the total burden of taxation on their citizens, whether levied by central or local government.

She said that in the coming session of Parliament they would introduce legislation to abolish the Greater London Council and the Metropolitan County Councils. In their quest for sound local government. they relied on the help of Conservative councillors. Their task should not be under-estimated and their virtues should not go unsung.

Denationalization had brought greater motivation to managers giving up their nuclear defence and workforce, higher profits

Terrorists are totally mistaken'

It was not easy to look into the minds of people of the kind who had planted the bomb in the Grand Hotel, Mr Douglas Hurd, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, told the

He added: "Perhaps they were moved by killing for the sake of killing; but perhaps they hoped to shake our resolve, your resolve, in carrying forward the work in which we are engaged. If so they were deeply and totally mistaken". There was a contrast here which they must all feel between what happened in darkness a few yards away, a few hours ago, and what the conference was doing in the light of day: one of the oldest, perhaps the oldest, democratic party in the world going calmly at its business.

Terrorists did not understand the truth which lay behind that contrast.

"Our system is stronger than applause. "The democracy which we have inherited will outlive their bombs and what you can do for the country that counts. That is our vision. and it is a vision worth defending, not one to be put at risk, and we shall defend it."

The Government would never put the defence of the country at risk. No one in their enses wanted nuclear weapons for their own sake, but equally no responsible prime minister could take the colossal gmble of while their greatest potential enemy kept theirs.

Britain since the time of Attlee, Truman, and Churchill - would wreck Nato and leave the country totally isolated from the United States - and friends they

"This party is pro-Ameri-can", she said. "We must constantly remind prople what the defence policy of the Labour party would mean. Their idea that by giving up our nuclear deterrent we could somehow escape the result of a nuclear war elsewhere is nonsense.

It was a delusion to assume that conventional weapons were sufficient defence against nuclear attack. No one should slip into the habit of thinking that conventional war is Europe was some kind of comfortable option. With the huge array of modern weapons held by the Soviet Union, including chemical weapons in large quantities, it would be a cruel and terrible

The truth was that possession of the nuclear deterrent had evented not only nuclear war but conventional war and the nuclear deterrent would continue to preserve this country's independence

Winston Churchill's warning was just as true today. "Once you take the position of not being able in any circumstances to defend your rights against aggression, there is no end to the demands that will be made or to the humiliations that must be accepted."

Yet Labour's deence policy retained no Polaris, no cruise missiles in Britain, no US nuclear bases in Britain, no Trident no independent nuclear deterrent. "There is I think just one answer the nation will give - no defence, no Labour government," he said. In foreign affairs, the year had seen two inportant diplomatic successes. A detailed and binding agreement had been reached with China on the future of Hongkong. It was an agreement designed to preserve Hongkong's flourishing econ-omy and unique way of life.

The Government believed it met the needs and wishes of the people of Hongkong. She had been told the executive council of Hongkong could recommend it to the people there in good

We want earners to be owners?

Turning to unemployment, Mrs Thatcher said it was the scourge of their times. To have over three million people unemployed was bad enough, even though they shared this tragic problem with other nations, but to suggest as some of their opponents did, that they did not care about it was as deeply wounding as it was utterly false. "Of course we looked back 40 years. Keynes' had provided the diagnosis: it was all set out in the 1944 White Paper on employment. "I bought it then. I have it still. My name is on the top of it: Margaret H Roberts. One of my staff took one look at it and said: 'I did not know it was as old as that' " (laughter).

Politicians took some parts of the formula and conveniently ignored the rest. The result was that the country ended up with high inflation and high unemployment. The Government was heeding the warnings. It had acted on basic truths set out in that famous White Paper.

If she had come out with all this today some people would call it Thatcherite, but it was vintage Maynard Keynes. He had a horror of inflation, a fear of too much state control, and a betief in the market. The Government had brought inflation down below 5 per cent. Output had been rising steadily since 1981 and investment was up substantially.

Why then did unemployment not fall if things were improving? There must be a time lag between getting other things right and getting a fall in unemployment. More jobs were being created. Over the past year more than 250,000 extra jobs had been created. But the population of working age was also rising quickly as the baby boom of the 1960s became the Turning to the miners' strike. she said that for more than seven months they had been living through an agonizing strike. The strike was not the Government's seeking. It was not of its making. The sheer bravery of the men who had kept the mining industry alive was beyond praise. She went on: "Scabs: their former workmates call them. Scabs? They are lions. Complain if there is bias in peace studies, Joseph tells parents

Sir Keith Joseph, Secretary of State for Education and Science, replying to a debate on education, urged parents to complain if they felt there was bias in peace studies in schools. The job of the teacher is to teach whatever his or her views may be and not to indoctrinate", he said. "The framework is there. The Government can only make sure bias does not creep in if the public complains.

"If any parent is dissatisfied about the objectivity of the teaching of peace studies or any other subject, let those parents complain to the teacher, to the head teacher, the governing body, or the local education authority and if still not satisfied, to the holder of my office. But there must be enough detail for ministers to be able to take the complaint seriously because of the repercussions on their child. They should group with a few others and make a group complaint and then there is protection for them. "I accept there is real concern, but I think the remedy must remain in the kands of the parents concerned", he said.

When young people left school they should have values and attitudes and understanding that equipped them to live fulfilling lives as adults, as citizens, as members of families, and at work.

Sir Keith was pleased that the conference recognized that money was not the only way to raise educational standards. It was not a guarantee of higher standards. Some local authorities had been to be better use of the money available.

The conference carried a motion, moved by Mr Frederick Allgood, of Fareham, Hampshire, approving the Secretary of State's initiative to raise standards in education and asking that more should be done to ensure that young people were equipped with skills and knowledge of relevant to Modern Britain.

Mr Allgood said there was evidence that education was far from relevant. Some jobs were impossible to fill because of a shortage of technological skills. Britain would need thousands of robotic engineers but there was no evidence to show that schools and universities knew how to cope with that. Many head teachers knew a lot about Wordsworth but very little about word processing. Mr John Godfrey, Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, said they must not just be vigilant about peace studies. The "trendy left" was beginning to get to work on traditional subjects such as history.

Referring to the new guidlines for the teaching of history in Scotland, he said the syllabus was likely to be a ticket for teachers to stop being educationalists and to start becoming activists. Socialists were trying to couple education and politics. Dr D. J. M. Muffett, Mid-Worcester-

Security, cooperation and UK status keys to Hurd's policy for Ulster

Mr Douglas Hurd, the newlyppointed Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, told the conference that he had been strenuously warned against the word "initiative". Any hopes it aroused in one community were exceeded by the angry anxieties aroused in the other.

The Government intended to proceed on the lines of a firm security policy, a continuing effort to bring the Northern freland parties together, a deepening of cooperation with the republic, and the mainten-ance of its settled and democratically based undertaking on the constitutional status of the province. Over time, patiently and consistently pursued, those policies could work.

The debate was opened by Mr Vernon Porter, Oxford East, who moved a resolution affirming support for the Armed Forces in Northern Ireland and backing the efforts of the Secretary of State to find a just solution to the problems of the

Mr Hard, replying to the debate, said that people, particularly in the United States, who contributed funds which found their way to the Pro-visional IRA were not buying the unity of Ireland but the death of Irishmen. He hoped that through the Anglo-Irish Inter-governmental -Council and regular discussions between Mrs Margaret Thatcher and the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic wider areas of cooperations could be

The statement by Mrs Margaret Thatcher this week on the sinking of the General Belgrano had revealed the Prime Minister to be a liar, Mr Tam Dalyell, Labour MP for Linlithgow, alleged last night.

On the Prime Minister's own admission she knew about the change in the course of the Argentine cruiser six months before she asserted during a television interview that it was steaming towards Britain's Task Force when it was sunk by HMS Conqueror on May 2, 1982, Mr Dalyell told a meeting in Angus.

Mrs Thatcher disclosed in a letter to Dr David Owen, the SDP leader, that ministers were not told until November, 1982. that the Belgrano had reversed course. But that was six months before she maintained the contrary when questioned on Nationwide by Mrs Diana Gould, a Cirencester housewife.

Rail crash public inquiry likely

By Christine Toomey

The Department of Transport is expected to launch a public inquiry into the rail crash at Wembley Central station which killed three people and injured 18, two of them severely.

Major Fred Rose, the department's chief accident inspector, was at the scene early yesterday and was scheduled to report his lindings directly to Mr Nicholas Ridley. Secretary of State for Transport.

But British Rail launched its own urgent investigation into the cause immediately after the accident, on Thursday evening. It is the latest in a number of recent crashes on British Rail killing and injuring dozens of passengers: on July 30 the Edinburgh to Glasgow train hit a cow on the track killing 13 and injuring 44; three days later 20 people were hurt when an express plunged down an embankment at Birtley, near Newcastle upon Tyne, injuring 20 passengers, and last Sunday 30 people were injured when

The three people killed were: William Goodson, aged 45, of Grassmere Way, Linslade, Bedfordshire; Peter Symmonds, also 45, of Brookend, Western

> British Rail experts spent the entire day yesterday checking all signals along the three-mile stretch of track leading up to the collision point.

A signals expert explained that there was an intricate failsafe system of signals which should have operated to warn both wivers of the danger.

Two hundred yards before each signal light, there is an advance warning system, which activates both audible and visual warnings to a driver if the signal shows red or amber. The passenger train, which is thought to have been travelling at a speed of about 40 mph, would have taken about 400 yds to stop with emergency break-

It should, therefore, have had ample time to stop after the first of three warning signals before the point of impact, one and a half miles down the track. Experts were yesterday checking the passenger train driver's cab for possible faults. The Post Office said that rail services could be seriously delayed because of the crash.

Philharmonia/ Salonen

Festival Hall

Esa-Peska Salonen is a Philharmonia find, and a rather considerable one. He first appeared with them just a year ago, as a last-minute replacement conducting Mahler's Third Symphony, and the orchestra was quick to snap up an agreement with him to appear exclusively with them in this country - which, as he has already been to the Berlin Philharmonic, Los Angeles, and the Vienna Symphony, cannot be a bad thing.

He is only 26, but his platform manner commands immediate attention: authoritative but expressive, with firm, rounded gestures that at times recall Muti's. He seems to encourage the Philharmonia's natural warmth, and that was a result which brought both positive and negative results on Thursday night. In Nielsen's Overture Helios it was unreservedly positive, and the blazing sonorities and pulsing, evermoving melodies were well caught.

butions rather less, not because of any deficiency in Elisabeth Harrison's performance but simply because one enters a negative kind of absurdity when a highly-trained singer sends her voice ricocheting through hearing as the centrepiece of the Three Little Fantasies for wind quintet. And it was good, too, to have a second chance, after a much longer interval, of hearing Ocean de terre. Within the context of Knussen's output this is a work of symphonic scope: (it plays for 12 minutes), and symphonic it seemed in the purposeful movement and cumulative weight of the Sinfonicità's performance under

John Carewe.
Teresa Cahill was the soloist here and also in Dallapiccola's triptych of Greek lyrics set in Ouasimodo's translations. The choice of Dallapicolla, another master of pristine clarity, to pair with Knussen was apt, and Miss Cahill's warm, lively singing brought out the refreshing, innocent eroticism he saw in the antique. Paul Griffiths

But Stravinsky's Pulcincila Suite cannot take too ample or lax an approach, and here, faced with a chamber section of the orchestra, Salonen was disappointingly vague and broad in his beat and the soloists (trumpet and double bass excepted) seemed unready for Stravinsky's inventive demands on their precision.

And though there were some olendid moments in Sibelius's Fifth Symphony at close, the finale emerged grand and broad, without that frightening edginess which the music can and surely should have.

Perhaps most of the audience had come for the evening's other work. Schumann's Cello Concerto, for that featured Paul Tortelier as soloist. But whether because the mood so took him. whether by way of considered response to this most restrained of cello concertos. Tortelier seemed recessively quiet in tone and unvaried in colour.

There was little of the dancing variety that a cellist can bring to this (admittedly unrewarding) work, and even in his overlong cadenza he sounded less than usually involved.

Bill T. Jones and Arnie Zane have come a long way since the duet programme that introduced them to London in the 1981 Dance Umbrella season. and it seems to me to have taken them in the wrong direction. Their earlier work had a warmth, daring and energy that have disappeared from their 1984 group creation, Freedom of Information, which is at Sadler's Wells until

True, the pace accelerates in the final section, but even there the movement is to a large extent a kind of semaphoring. with some rushing around but very little contact between the dancers. Zane stays on the sidelines for much of that sequence, and looks generally as if not in condition for the old taut rhythms and quick, acrobatic partnering. He also suffers from the fact that this auditorium, much larger than the ICA or Riverside where they played before, compels him to a declamatory manner in two spoken passages. It is far less effective than the throwaway conversational style in which they used to speak while dancing. Besides, the laboured, self-consciously clever texts by Jones lacks the flip humour and crazy relevance of earlier work.

In short, Jones and Zane have gone arty and pretentious. the expense of kinetic originality and flair. Their new piece does not make the relevance of its fine-sounding title readily apparent, Perhaps it is about that old cliche, noncommunication. The middle section (out of three) takes place in, around or on the top ledge of a giant metal playpen. Zane several times engages in a stylized ritual of perfunctory seduction with one or another woman, a look of deep disgust on his face.

Much of the action is confined to the hands and arms, and a lot of time is spent striking poses - sometimes stiffly heroic, often in the distorted shapes invented by Pilobolus, another company that put ingenuity before impetus in its work. The new dancers with Jones and Zane, although proficient, have bodies and movement qualities that emphasize gymnastic abruptness rather than fluency.

The lighting effects are often very clever, although sometimes distracting, in their use of quickly shifting patterns. David Cunningham's score, however, with its insistent simple rhythms and smug voice-over giving repeated instructions to the (recorded) players seems no great help. Presumably the familiar Chopin piano tune played from time to time is meant to grow tiresome through over-repetition.

Some boogie-woogie towards the end of section two and the speed of the finale stirred up enthusiasm from the first-night audience, but the general effect is tepid and empty, creating a sense of tedium even though it lasts, with an intermission, less than 90 minutes.

Opera Full value

Cosi fan tutte Glyndebourne

No one this year on Glyndebourne's tour route needs fear that, away from the greensward and the hampers, they are receiving second-hand or second-rate goods. Indeed it would be difficult to imagine a more thoroughly satisfying staging of Peter Hall's Cosi than that devised by Lucy Bailey for the young touring company, and conducted with brightness and breadth by Jane Glover.

Care has clearly been lavished on every detail; the cast is well-chosen, and already strongly integrated. Flordiligi (Eiddwen Harrhy) and Dora-bella (Louise Winter) bounce ideas and emotions off each other with a sympathy which provides superb impetus in recitative and duet. Individually, Ms Winter's voice is the more resonant and colourfully responsive: Ms Harrhy, whose top register sounds dry and pushed to its limit (a cold. perhaps?) is nonetheless the evening's focus for sheer Mozartian style. The two men. Glenn Winslade's Ferrando and Peter Coleman-Wright's Gug-lielmo as yet come over less strongly, though they each make a vivid vocal contribution. Lesley Garrett's Despina, ripe and succulent, finds any number of shades of the sardonic and capricious in her every initiative and response. And Roger Bryson's Don Alfonso is the hero of the evening a mobile slit of a mouth and a raw-edged elegance express a cunning paradox of mischief and resignation, sadism and wise humanity. His slowly changing visage during Ferrando's "Un" aura amorosa provides perceptive subtext to the role and, indeed, to the entire work.

The production's excellence almost distracts attention away from its otherwise most newsworthy element: Glynde-bourne's pioneering use in this country of "supertitles". 22 abbreviated translation projected high up just below the proscenium. I have grave doubts about the effect of their regular use on opera's symbiotic relationship of word and music. This is not the place to debate the issue suffice to say that, in their positioning, typeface, tim-ing and verbal substance. Glyndebourne's are both efficient and discreet. Missing the butterfly

Manon

Coliseum

Massenet's Manon is a tricky butterfly to trap on the wing. When his production was fresh five years ago John Copley came close to catching it, abetted by the evocative sets of Henry Bardon (much influ-enced by eighteenth century French painting) and the performances of Valerie Mastersor and John Brecknock. Now, with the Bardon decorations starting to look drab and Masterson and Brecknock no longer on hand, the present revival misses the butterfly by several yards.

Just as with Covent Garden's Don Pasquale, much of the problem stems from the pit. Henry Lewis too often clambers over the score with hobnailed boots instead of treading it in dancing pumps. The orchestra is encouraged to sound as though it is playing Giordano not Massener. The fourth act goes with panache but otherwise, even making allowances for the orchestral disputes that have plagued the house these last few days, this is a thoroughly undistinguished debut with the ENO.

Much more promise emerges from the other newcomer, the young Canadian soprano. Frances Ginzer, in the title role.

to show the changing faces of Manon from the flirt emerging from her shell, through the favourite of the Cours-la-Reine to the prisoner racked with illness. She shows her best form in the middle act's gavone, displaying a voice with a full and brilliant top – the bottom sounds less secure. The performance will grow when she sheds more of her inhibitions. Miss Ginzer is only 28 and we will be hearing more of her.

Anthony Rolfe Johnson, by contrast, rarely suggests he is a Des Grieux. The diction may be clean - too clean for Edmund Tracey's indifferent translation but the head tones for the two arias are not there; the dogged style of acting conveys neither the infatuated boy of Act I nor the pretty young Abbe of Si. Sulpice who has the hearts of his parishoners fluttering with more than religious emotion. Those who fitted earlier into the production, among them Alan Opie's truculent Lescaut and Richard Van Allan's ruefui Comte Des Grieux, are much happier.

Act 1 is still chopped off short with the elopement of the lovers which leaves part of the plot unexplained, and the evening star which cheers Manon's last moments is no where to be seen.

Television Warm-up bout for the big fight

Next Friday London Weekend will hold the ring for a specially staged fight between Mr Patrick Jenkin and Mr Ken Living-stone, respectively for and against the abolition of the GLC. Last night's edition of Gavin Weightman's The Mak-ing of Modern London (ITV) offered a historical warm-up bout for both the GLC battle and the parallel confrontation over the rate-capping law. ..

Did you know that in 1921 many councillors for the impoverished borough of Poplar were imprisoned for refusing to levy rates which they con-sidered unfairly high? That ten strations supporting them were escorted to Holloway by 10,000 other supporters? And that in forcing the London County Council to re-rate their borough, the councillors won?

The terms in which survivors described the atmosphere struck an unsettlingly familiar note. "It was a time of wonderful enthusiasm, a sort of revivalist feeling", said a woman who had been a mere slip of a girl at the time. "We didn't understand exactly what they were doing. but we knew it was something wonderful." Yesterday's Islington Gazette reported its borough leader as saying that the

He did not quite succeed and, as one inflamed contributor declined to shut-up was reduced to tapping the table and insisting. "All right! Come on! Eloise, cool it!" What brought him to this pass?

On this occasion it was a debate on multicultural education in which Ray Honeyford. the Bradford headmaster who has been so rash as to question its premises and practice, was brought face to face with his critics. A week later. last Sunday. Mr Oppenheimer pre-sided while Teresa Gorman. Conservative champion of free enterprise, defended herself before a panel of women trades unionists. This time he was not driven to such lengths to maintain order, but he could just as well have ended with the self-same words: "We are not zoing to get agreement tonight". No indeed: nor any other time of any other day, for Poles Apart, you see, is dedicated to and only capable of achieving more or less intractable dis-agreement and opposition.

Although in the first programme Mr Honeyford astonishingly kept his cool, that was true of very few of his assailants. Before the encounter was over, the emotional tem-perature had reached boiling point, wild assertions flew like leaves in a gale, no one allowed a viewpoint, other than his or her own, nothing was changed except undoubtedly for the

The second programme was less heated, but even at a lower

"We are not going to get temperature and level of vit-agreement here tonight, ladies uperative energy, the same and gentlemen " With these observations applied. And of course, we, the listeners, learned almost nothing about the matters at issue.

If Poles Apart then is a kind of broadcasting which we need like a hole in the head, it's by no means the only one. In my opinion, Raymond Briggs's When the Wind Blows (Radio Oct 6: director, John Tydeman) has claims to be another. First broadcast and repeated in February 1983 (when I reviewed it), it received a third hearing last Saturday

In case you never heard, or less likely - have forgotten it, the play tells of the fate of two real dumb-bells. Jim and Hilda Bloggs, under nuclear attack and their pathetic extinction. Of course from one point of view we are all dumb-bells under the bomb. But there are other messages which When the Wind Blows conveys and which it shares with other more famou tellers of the same tale: The War Game, The Day After, Threads.

All of them, in my view, have helped to strengthen the impression that nuclear war is inevitable. Nobody, however knows that. They have all forwarded the assumption that it will be total, though nobody can be sure of that either. They have all implied very strongly that nothing can be done to mitigate the effects of an attack Finally they all seem to have been made to frighten us a great deal. Too much fear only adds to our sense of helplessness and may, by a process I sense, but cannot explain, actually make the outcome that we fear more likely rather than less. Surely in areas like this, like those in which Poles Ipart is operating, radio should be promoting informed discussion, not pour ing petrol on a blaze.

Liverpool FC are keeping cool in the face of hostilities from Argentine politicians. In December, the World Club final matches Liverpool against the Argentine side Independiente and this is too good a chance for a politician to miss. A couple of Argentine MPs have suggested that the Independiente players should wear badges on their shirts bearing a map of an island group in the South Atlantic, along with the slogan: "The Malvinas are Argentinian". Liverpool's chief executive. Peter Robinson, would only remark: "Under the rules of the competition, no badges or insignia can be worn - we can't even wear our sponsors' logo." He found an ally in Independente player Claudio Marangoni, who used to play for Sunderland. "We are all convinced the Malvinas are ours," said Marangoni, "but this would be a cheap way of showing it. Sport is supposed to bring people together, not divide them."

He parked his car, with Irish registration plates, outside Towcester police station and went off to ride at Towcester races. When he returned his car was gone. The police, worried that it might contain a bomb, made a forcible entry "with the aid of an explosive device", in the words of a police spokesman. Newman was barely able to drive it away.

The camels not only stopped play four times, they also inspired Old Suttonians, who retrieved the match from a hopeless position. They were eventually retrieved by the local circus, from which they had escaped.

BARRY FANTONI

The end of the world must be nearer

Thursday having been reached, the clock having passed eight in the evening it was time once more for all of us whose business in Brighton was politics, whether practitioner or observer, to face the joys and rigours of a Conservative conferences's final night of socializing.

The day's writing done, off then to the beloved Grand: the superb wedding cake of a hotel on the seafront. This is the building which for years has divided with the Blackpool Imperial all the folklore and intrigue of the British party conference. Here is the place to see and be seen: for journalists to demonstrate their acquaintance with rulers, and rulers, more selectively, to demonstrate their's with journalists. All the waving, nodding, hullo'ing and bantering swirls amid a throng of the constituency humble. of unknown backbenchers, PR men, pretty and treacherous girls from gossip columns out to lure the-mighty into indiscretion. Treading warily through the rowd, eyes ever watchful for bores, I felt a shove at the shoulder and turned to find with delight that the shover was Norman Tebbit. It so happened that I had just finished writing about his success on the platform that day. Bantering ensued. He mocked me from out of a ring of what looked like admirers from the constituencies. Perhaps his wife was at his side. I cannot remember. What he said I soon forgot. I was not to know that the outside world would want to learn of his every word and act this evening.

I bantered back something suitably fatuous about his speech having been deplorably elevated in tone and about how he might turn out to have been a wet all along he threw back his head with a scoff, and wished me a convivial night out. He knew he had enjoyed a deserved success that day. At ease among his admirers, glass in hand, he was enjoying what, for any politician of his ambition, was a rare moment of serenity before further struggle.

Off then to something called the Starlight Room of the rather lessthan-beautiful Metropole next door. At the table in front of us, Mr Edward du Cann was giving a dinner party which included Sir Robin Day and Mr John Wakeham, the Chief Whip, and his wife Roberta, she in the last hours of her life, he within hours of his ordeal under the rubble. At the table behind us, presided Mr John Gummer, chairman of the Conservative Party, and his wife Penelope. The various gatherings merged as they got up to leave.

On through the crowd. The Tebbit circle disappeared behind me. Soon we were all plunged into the nightly conference ritual of the rendezvous for dinner.

There was much jostling. A slender young woman called Alison Ward from the Gummers' table came over to say that what we all had to decide was whether to go to the conference ball or to drink champagne with Lord McAlpine, treasurer of the Conservative Party: a host of fabled generosity whose suite in the Grand was a few windows away from where the bomb. was to do its work.

We all agreed that politics was full of these terrible dilemmas. Miss Ward had been one of Mrs Thatcher's secretaries. Since the general election she had had a job which placed her still more at the centre of things: special assistant to Mr Wakeham. We agreed, that after the punishing course that was the Young Conservatives' Ball the night before, Lord McAlpine's hospitality

Back to the Grand. Lord McAlpine dispensed champagne. Mr Denis Thatcher arrived in evening dress. Just been to the Conference Ball with the PM, he explained. Very noisy band, difficult to dance. PM back working on her speech. It was now well past midnight.

Mr Gordon Reece, special adviser to the Prime Minister, a hugely genial man quoted with working many wonders on her mastery of television, reported that work on the speech was still going on. Mr Wakeham was there. So too were various magnificos from the mysterious National Union of Conservative Associations. Mr Thatcher, in expansive mood, delivered strong views on the television licence. Eventually, it was time to return to Wheelers Hotel on the seafront, a few hundred yards from the Grand, and sleep the sleep of the well victualled.

A friend and I came upon Sir Anthony Berry, MP for Southgate. returning his two small dogs from a walk, and rejoining his wife in their room off the Grand's third-floor landing. "We must have lunch soon," he said. His wife was to survive: he was not.

After some indeterminate period of slumber, the telephone rang. The woman at the switchboard said I might like to know that a bomb had just gone off in the Grand. I had heard nothing. Was it serious? Surely not, I dozed for five minutes. Sirens sounded outside, I pulled on some clothes and went downstairs where a youth was sobbing hysterically face down on the reception counter, repeating that it was

Mr Peter Morrison, Under-Secretary of Employment, suddenly appeared on the pavement in his shirtsleeves. He had been fast asleep, he said, after working on his boxes "like a good boy". Then the bells went off. Bloody Young Conservatives playing a boring prank, he had assumed. Then there were people banging on his door and telling him to come out, and here he was. Must have been a fire. "Did you hear the bomb?" I asked him. "What bomb?" "I think dear boy, that I know more about this crisis than you do," I remember telling him. He expressed appropriate astonishment at news of a bomb. Round to the front of the hotel, or as near to it as we could get, which was behind police cordons 50 yards away. Lord Gowrie could be seen bringing deck chairs up from the beach into which he assisted

Sir Keith sat on an upturned red despatch box on the promenade. Similarly seated, nearby, was the Solicitor-General, Sir Patrick Mayhew, fully suited. A bright moon hung in a dark blue sky on a night exceptionally warm for the time of year. A beautiful light was thus cast over the terrifying scene of a tall stretch of the Grand's facade collapsed like Ronan Point.

It was hours before we learned how many people had been injured or how serious it all was. But many good friends could be seen safe on the promenade in divers forms of nightwear. Despite the terrible look of the Grand, a lot of us wanted to assume the best. We did not know that, during all these hours, firemen were working to free Mr Tebbif and Mr Wakeham, and that Mrs Wakeham was dying. The neigh-bouring Metropole took in the refugees. A Tory lady could be heard giving some magnificent advice to another: "We'll ring up the manag-ing director of Marks and Spencer." get him to open early so we can al get kitted up properly for the conference." And, indeed, at daybreak, the incomparable Lord

McAlpine had arranged just that. He was safe, though forced to flee the hotel without his Garrick Club tie which for some reason, he regards as his only correct neckwear. He insisted on borrowing a journal-ist's Garrick Club tie for the temainder of the day. Sir Robin Day had been forced to abandon in the Grand all his clothes, his spectacles and all supplies of bow ties. What the nation would want to know, I remember musing, was (1) whether he was safe and (2) what he wore in bed. The answer to the first was, yes, and to the second, paisley pyjamas under a sky blue dressing gown with dark stripes.

At 6.30 the throng gathered around the Metropole's television sets. Never had BBC breakfast television had such an audience. On to the screen came horrifying images accompanied by a superbly lucid report by a BBC political reporter, John Harrison, in a firm voice free from hysteria which revealed to most of us the horror of the event for the first time.

With the dawn came a realization of the awesome nature of the crime. Attempts had been made to murder the rulers of a free people. We had all been close to a great and terrible

Up with Portcullis and Co

A friend presented us with a wedding gift: a seventeenth century paper cut picture of Williams Camden, antiquarian and Claren-ceux, King of Arms. "The last good herald", we were told. Looking around the hall of the College of Arms at the dinner to commemorate their 500th anniversary I felt this pronouncement a little unjust. From the walls peered down at us from carvas and panel the faces of generations of heraids from Tudor times to the present, while around the table our hosts were identifiable by the enamelled medallion of the royal arms they wore.

One of the heralds extraordinary opposite me explained that there vas at present no room for any more of them as they had run out of tabards. I had always wondered about these marvellous garments ever since first encountering them in Teniel's illustrations to Lewis Carroll. Apparently they cost no less than £20,000 each to make, and heralds on state occasions are laced into them. This in itself is interesting because it preserves a medieval way of fastening clothes, universal before the advent of the button let alone the zip fastener. Stiff with gold embroidery, they must virtually stand up on their own and their weight must be consider-

The very names of the heralds and pursuivants have always mes-merized me Garter, Clarenceux, Portcullis, Richmond, Bluemantle, Rouge Croix, Norroy and Uister. Add to them those who act as extraordinaries bearing titles appertaining to the Earl Marshal: Norfolk, Arundel and Maltravers.

It is almost 30 years since I had my first contact with what was then a mysterious institution, the College of Arms in London's Queen Victoria Street. I had come across a reference to cheques for Elizabethan tournaments in their possession, for in the sixteenth century heralds acted in the same way as those who keep score at cricket today. That occasion was my initial encounter with Sir Anthony Wagner whose magisterial Heralds of England appeared in 1967. But my main memory was his lament over the problems posed by including miner's lamps in coats-of-

What one notices most looking back since then, however, is the enormous change in attitude on the part of that ancient institution and its inmates. It has voyaged from being what struck one as an inward looking clique guarding inherited prerogatives to one which is acutely aware of its role as keepers of a mighty tradition that embraces not only the minutiae of genealogy and aware of a wider national commitment. That was embodied in the appeal to create a separate museum of heraldry in which the College's treasures could be shown to the public. Although that never materiafized in its original bold form, it came to fruition in more modest manner in the present display in the Tower of London.

retreat and that perhaps ought to be remedied. Where, for instance, would English art be without it? It is saturated with heraldry wherever one looks in any building, secular or ecclesiastical. Heraldry too is the only part of the repertory of decoration to survive the onslaught of the modernist movement, for no designer can tamper with a coat-ofarms. To do so is to crode an dentity.

It was Lincoln Kirstein who once remarked, having seen, if I remember rightly, Churchill's funeral, that the Earl Marshal was the world's greatest choreographer. The observation was an acute one, even if it might come as a surprise to the present Duke of Norfolk to be bracketed with Petipa and Balanchine. To my eye our genius in the dance stems as much as anything from our inherent feeling for ordered ceremonial.

In the field of state occasions the heralds are keepers of the choreographic notation for these events. Their archives record each procession, in terms of its order, its dress and symbolic attribute. Every movement of the body is noted: the bearing of attributes from crowns to wands of office, bowing in deference or kneeling in fealty. All of these ingredients brought together and orchestrated give us the tremendous crowd scenes which make up a state funeral, wedding or a coron ation, drawing them into a web of

Blacks who still

One of the reasons that six South African dissidents sought refuge in the British consulate rather than other consulates in Durban is that for historical reasons black South Africans expect more from Britain

Earlier this year a black community in the Transvaal sent a petition to the Queen for support against South African government orders evicting them from their land for racial reasons, and although Britain gave up sovereignty over South Africa in 1909, many blacks continue to hope Britain will exercise some influence on their

Viewed against historical obligations, the expectation is reasonable. But nineteeth century history of Southern Africa is littered with treaties and guarantees between African chiefs and the British. On some notable occasions Britain has honoured these agreements to the displeasure of Afrikaner and other white minority governments in the

For several decades in this century Pretoria made repeated demands to Britain for incorporation into South Africa of the three British Protectorates - now Boiswana. Lesotho and Swaziland - but Britain stood by its guarantees to the three and supports their independent status to this day.

Black South Africans also applanded Britain, and Iain Macleod in particular, for honouring similar pledges to Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) and Nyasaland (Malawi) when the white Southern Rhodesians were insisting on the preservation of the Central African Federation against the clear wishes in the black territories concerned. But it is in South Africa itself that blacks believe Britain has its strongest moral obligation to support their cause, because it was against the repeated appeal of black delegations to London until 1909 that Britain handed them over to the mercies of white minority rule.

The number of times South

African blacks scraped together pennies and shillings from all over the country to send their spokesmen 6,000 miles to London to plead their cause was evidence of their belief that if only Britons knew the real facts of their plight justice would be done. Even more remarkable than this trust was the persistence of it after the Statute of Westminster reinforced the total sovereignty Britain had conferred on the white minority in South Africa, Black delegations continued to make the trusting pilgrimage to London.

The last prominent delegate to make the journey was Nelson Mandela in 1962. Shortly before returning to South Africa and imprisonment for life, he spoke of his admiration for Britain's parliamentary system and the civil rights tradition developed from the Magna Carta.

He spoke for many blacks, and would be speaking for them today if allowed to comment on the sanctuary sought by the dissidents in the Durban consulate, because it was partly to highlight the absence in South Africa of the rule of law as understood in Britain - the absence of Magna Carta and habeas corpus that they made their stand. And last week three of them underscored the point by walking out to be imprisoned without trial.

These are not fugitives from justice, nor persons defying a sentence pronounced in a normal court of law; nor are they even accused of any crimes. The fact is that the South African police are allowed to lock them up without any hearing or evidence or testing thereof in any tribunal, and plainly intend to do so.

Many Britons still don't appear to understand that South African "law" allows a politician of cabinet rank to imprison anyone for any length of time without explanation. South Africa, originally one of the countries which inherited the tra-dition of Magna Carta, tore up its version of it 21 years ago, and today a government minister's power to ban, banish or imprison any dissidents by signature on a piece of paper is absolute.

They still have trials for criminal matters in South Africa and even for political matters where a statute law has been demonstrably contravened. But for dissidents who stay within statute law they have devised the principle whereby politicians function as judges and jury, reaching their "verdicts" in the privacy of their ministerial offices.

It is the full comprehension of this principle that black South Africans. and especially the three dissidents still in refuge in Durban, hope for from the British, and it is their own experience of it which makes them react so strongly when Mr Graham Archer of the British embassy in South Africa says their situation must be reviewed in the light of the Natal Supreme Court decision affirming the minister's right to imprison them without trial. Supreme Court? Decision? Does Mr Archer or his embassy really regard a South African court as a normal court of law? The "Natal Supreme Court" simply ruled that imprisonment without trial is legal in South Africa and that the government does not have to justify the ministerial sentence. So what is new? What is new is that it is even more important, now that this draconian system is again publicly affirmed in a South African supreme court", that Britain should not collaborate with such shameful perversion of law by abandoning the dissidents to South Africa's political police.

Hard cash, soft

The best meal I had on the Mekong was given to me by the people's committee in the town of Chau Duc; it was also the funniest meal. And when I say that, I include dinner at an enchanting riverside restaurant in Phoon Penh where the main dish was "Soupe de Poulet Rire" Laughing Chicken Soup, in which the bird is stewed with marijuana plants, with a divine after-effect - or so I am told.

Chau Duc is up the road from Can Tho. the capital of the Mekong delta. It is just over halfway between Saigon (now Hochiminhville) and the border with Kampuches, to which we were heading. We went by this stretch of road because that was what our ever helpful, ever watchful guides asked us to do. We were to rejoin the river at Chau Duc.

It was a marvellous drive. The road was covered with great patches of gold. It was unhusked rice drying in the sun. Sampans carried it in arge bundles through the flooded fields to the roadside; there threshing machines cast the stalks in great fountains into the air and poorly dressed farmers, men and women, raked the grains on the tarmac. The wealth of Vietnam was there lying on the road - the only dry place. It was a glorious sight, though sadly food is still very short in Vietnam. Partly because of dreadful weather (typhoons), lack of foreign aid (fertilisers), and poor economic

We had a long, pleasant morning filming the threshing. When we arrived at Chau Duc we were hot and hungry. Our guides told us that we were to have lunch at the People's Committee Building - a fine old house on the river bank. There a pleasant-seeming person. the Vice-Chairman responsible for Culture and Information. Comrade Tran Tuan, informed us that they

- but no lunch. I said that we needed food but he was not to worry - we would go to a private restaurant in the town.

This led to a great and sometimes spirited debate - party officials never seemed to like their guests to eat privately - and eventually we, and about 10 local officials, piled into cars and were taken to a state restaurant. Upstairs we went and there were two tables, each set for six to eight people and with some fine dishes already on them.

Then the feast began. Never in Vietnam have I seen such food. Not even in the old days of the "puppet regime" of President Thieu. Certainly not since the triumph of Marxism-Leninism. In the old days I saw food more delicately served perhaps. But I never saw such delicacies as these served at all.

First there was tiger snake - Ran Ho: Then there was the airbag of fish Sun. Then some rather shockingly ordinary dishes, like chicken, both curried and roast: crisp vegetables. some meat and other fish dishes. maybe a dozen or so - and masses of beer and vodka ("Vietnamese gasoline" as one of our officials loved to call it).

All of this was marvellous, far more than we had expected. But there was more to come. The piece de resistance had been kept till last. On to each table was set a large plate containing three cooked turtles. There they were, the entire creatures, little paws and tails poking out under the shells, heads mercifully retracted. One of the officials at my table was the Vice-Chairman of the Provincial Committee Responsible for the Distribution of Foodstuffs.

"How very appropriate that you should be here." I said. The Vice-Chairman it was who now took the backs off the turtles as if they were lids to reveal inside everything. Full dorsal was the view we had. Tubes and pipes, bellows and liver, kidneys and much muscle.

And worst of all, many little turtle

I regret to say that I found the animals hard to look at and even Tuc, our superb, clever and everpatient guide from Hanoi TV. looked a little white. "I have never caten this," she said. But there was no holding her southern comrades. With the speed of summer lightning their chopsticks began to dance over the boiled turtle bodies, picking and sawing away. Gradually more and more of the turtles' parts disappeared. I tried one piece very gingerly and found that it tasted like salt rubber. I was offered eggs and politely declined them. In the end the only thing that was left was one tail. The tail is an aphrodisiae", one official told me.

"Then how come no one has caten it?" I asked. "You have it." said the Vice-Chairman".
"No thank you," I said, "I am far from home. Comrade Chairman you should have it." And so, with a smile he took it. He picked the thing apart in his chopsticks, plunged it into his mouth and took a large-draught of beer. "Tonight I sleep with my wife", he said, and beiched.

Later I learned that they presented us with a bill for 6,000 dong for the meal. Now on the official rate of exchange that is $600, which might seem a trifle high even for such a repast. The more so because every district has a budget for entertaining foreigners – usually, of course, Russians and their ilk. We were arriving officially, and so this gave the party the right to order a fine meal which they themselves would share - all on the budget.
I supposed that when we arrived they tried to palm us off with oranges and tea in the hope that they could have the feast entirely for themselves. When it became clear that this was impossible they gave in with good grace, but then insisted we pay. After a good deal of discussion among our guides, the bill was reduced to 3,000 dong or $300 at the official rate of exchange.

Still a lot? No, not really - at least, not for us. In fact it was almost nothing at the rate at which most dollars are exchanged for bundles of old dongs wrapped in grubby newspaper on Vietnam's black market. In a way it was all reassuringly normal. After all journalists get drunk on inflated expenses and businessmen do no work at all over triple decker martinis every day in London. Why shouldn't the Vietnamese have a blow-out and get a bit more money from the BBC? Particularly since the memory of the food (turtles apart) would be a joy for ever What a laugh! What a lunch! I thought, as I settled happily down in a sampan for the next

The Brighton bomb represents the most destructive single assault on the organs of the state since the attempt to blow up parliament 380 years ago. Of course the threat of individual assassination always surrounds individual political leaders. In this case, however, the objective was to wipe out most of the British Government who were concentrated uncharacteristically in a single location. We are lucky today that the country is not looking for a new Prime Minister, a new Foreign Secretary, Home Secretary, Industry Secretary, and several other senior members of the Cabinet.

We should not belittle that challenge simply because those who have thrown down the gauntlet deserve to be treated with contempt as individuals. We all know that terrorism is a dirty little game. It is a disease which flourishes in free societies because it is born of dictatorships. We know that it should not be dignified by the term "terrorism" since its acts are those of common criminals. specializing only in attack by remote control and the camaradcrie of collective punishment, of tarring and feathering and the murder of their own.

We know that terrorism is more concerned with publicity than with the tactical disciplines of war. This imposes a very special responsibility on the organs of publicity - the media to be conscious of that narrow borderline between serving the public interest and serving the narrow publicism of murderers. As Mr Hurd said yesterday, we can have no truck with terrorists. We must condemn terrorists and we must regard them with contempt; but we should not belittle the enormity of the challenge which they present to our society and our institutions. Somehow a liberal democracy has to reconcile its own innate ance that cratic ideal will triumph with sufficient resolution to protect that ideal not just with argument, but with active measures against the encroachment of 1crrorism.

. A more appropriate response, therefore, than anger on its own is resolution, fuelled perhaps by anger but not undermined by it. All that is dark, imperfect, stupid, guilty or cowardly about our fellow men exists in part in each of us as individuals. That propensity to violence glows like an ember in the soul of man. In the aftermath of the Brighton bomb yesterday it was business as usual at the Conservative conference, epitomized by the morning's proceedings and the Prime Minister's speech.

After responding with resolution to the atrocity and sorrow for the suffering of friends and colleagues, Mrs Thatcher devoted most of her speech to those two issues whose underlying difficulties had certainly subdued the conference for a week - unemployment and the coal strike. She went some way with her explanations to reach those people who are disconcerted by the apparent inability of the labour market to produce more jobs. She explained to them that governments have no miracle cure. Of course one speech along these lines is not enough, and it must be a refrain taken up by ministers and amplified with humanity and clarity for as long as the unemployment situation makes law, Mrs Thatcher was saying what needed to be said. She is right to think that this is probably the most testing crisis of our time, right to say that the fight was in a good cause and for the law. A declaration that the government would not weaken was what the nation wanted to hear and yesterday of all days the renewed commitment not to vield to any attempt to destroy parliamentary government was made particularly apposite by the circumstances in which it was delivered. Beyond the speech, however, lies the question of ministerial security, so gravely threatened by a murderous bomb. A liberal society cannot tolerate such stringent security that its leaders are denied access to the people and the people denied access to their leaders. The duty falls on the police to reconcile these difficult considerations, when society is faced with an implacable threat from groups and individuals who will exploit all that they see as weakness in the tolerance and openness of a liberal society. At Brighton the technicalities of security for Cabinet ministers concentrated together outside Downing Street were obviously applied to the limits which were deemed satisfactory. Yet some technical deficiency is revealed by the successful introduction of such a large explosive device into a building which must at the time have contained more sensitive targets for terrorism than any other building in the country.

Nevertheless there is a limit to what the techniques of protection can do. Security, the selfconfidence of a society, is ultimately a state of mind and not a situation on the ground. As Mr Hurd said yesterday it is the confidence that we will be going about our lawful occasions long after the last terrorist has blown himself up that will ultimately sustain us. If we allow fear to condition our procedures so that ministers cower behind the castle walls and individuals look over their shoulder for what might be in store for them, we will have become conditioned to violence ment's case and the investment and that battle within will have capital it was providing for the been lost. Only in those circumstances could the terrorist and the thug have gained their

It is the infinite resourcefulness of a liberal society, with its depth, its plurality and its vision which must be matched against the one-eyed monster in its cave. If a people is proud enough of its heritage to protect what it has, it must be confident enough to know that what has taken centuries to build cannot be removed so easily or so peremptorily, whatever sacrifice is required. Beyond the night comes the day; and with the dawn comes the hope that, onward and upward, the land will indeed be bright.

The terraces fell from favour after they were built, yet at their advent they were thought so splendid that a Crabbe Robinson could claim they would give more glory to Regency Britain than the victories of Britain Waterioo and Trafalgar".

From Mr Nigel Waterson Sir. Despite the occasional minor criticism voiced in your newspaper and elsewhere, the Draft Agreement on the Future of Hongkong can rightly be regarded as a triumph of British diplomacy, particularly when one considers the indifferent hand dealt by history to the British negotiators, in a Bow Group paper carlier this year, entitled Hong Kong's Future - Countdown to Communism?, I listed various areas where the negotiators should attempt to obtain detailed assurances. e draft agreement has dealt with all those worries, and more. There is no more to be done (on paper at least) and any opposition either here or in Hongkong to the agreement as drafted would be unrealistic. It must, therefore, be in the longterm interests of the People's Republic of China to encourage confidence in the new arrangements. That confidence might be lacking for three basic reasons. First, despite the pragmatism of the present regime in Peking, the recent history of China has been a turbulent one. Secondly. the PRC are proposing to give promises on matters with which they have little familiarity (for example, the functioning of a highly capitalist system). Thirdly, they are guaranteeing freedoms which they do not, on the whole, permit to their own people (for example, the guarantees as to religion in Hongkong, when there have been largescale arrests of Christians recently in Henan province). The PRC will, however, have an carly opportunity to dispel such suspicions, by their attitude to the Sino-British Joint Liaison Group. which is to start its deliberations when the agreement comes into force, and continue until the year 2000. It is expressly stated that the

Better protection for ministers

From Mr Michael Winner

Sir, As we suffer the shock of the bomb attack on the Grand Hotel, Brighton, and regardless of an enquiry yet to come, it does seem that the whole strategy of security in such circumstances needs a total re-think.

We tend to laugh at the Americans when President Reagan visits here with an entourage of secret service men, but ultimately the sheer deployment of numbers has to be a security safeguard.

If we can send hundreds of policemen to ensure a handful of miners can exercise their right to walk into their place of work, then surely we can find some additional men to protect our Prime Minister and Cabinet.

I have frequently been in America at the same hotel as the President. There are secret service men on every floor, in elevators, scattered through the lobby, on each landing and staircase. Nothing is impossible, but so far no bombs have got through. Protecting people in public streets is a very different matter. It is surely time to realise we no

It may well be that those who refuse to speak out against violence in lesser forms also have

Maiden Castle dig

From the Chairman of The British Archaeological Trust

Sir, Your announcement (September 28) that the Prince of Wales is to "back" a new excavation at Maiden Castle will, I am sure, fill many archaeologists with apprehension, particularly if (as the official press release states) it is to be carried out to mark the holding of the World Archaeological Congress in the UK in 1986" and (as Lord Montagu of Beaulieu stated), "it is to give congress delegates and the general public a unique chance to see English Heritage [formerly the DOE Ancient Monuments Inspectorate at work in the archaeological area."
The main question which needs to be asked is, why re-excavate Maiden Castle? If congress members (or the general public) want to see a hill fort excavation, why shouldn't they visit Professor Barry Cunliffe's unique excavation at Danebury (already the most comprehensive hill fort excavation in western Europe)?

If they want to see "English Heritage at work in the archaeologi-cal area." they should be taken to the proposed (and by 1986, one hopes; completed) new interpretation and presentation facilities at Stonehenge, Dover Castle, etc. Let us also hope that by then they may be able to buy the full report of the excavations carried out at Stonehenge 30 years ago and still not yet oublished. If however, it really is felt necessary to carry out a special excavation for the 1986 congress, it would surely be much more appropriate for the excavation to be either a "rescue" excavation (as this is where English Heritage spends, quite properly, the majority of its excavation funds) or at the very least the digging of a major site that really does need re-excavation before it can be displayed.

A very good example of the latter is the uniquely important medieval royal palace site at Clarendon, near Salisbury, where the excavations, conducted 50 years ago and still unpublished, are in a scandalous

Emmanuel College.

From the Master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge

Sir, The debate on whether VAT should be imposed on books is likely to be long and complex. We should be wary of resorting too readily to cries of "tax on knowledge". A glance at the lurid covers that fill most bookshop windows, or at the advertising and marketing content of The Bookseller, does not suggest that knowledge or general culture are primary aims of very many books. Mr Clive Bingley has already made some appropriate remarks in a recent number of The Bookseller.

Yet there are books which disseminate often recondite knowledge, or cater to small yet valuable groups, and these books might suffer disproportionately if VAT were

It cannot be said too often that the price of a book is determined very largely by the number of copies a publisher thinks he can sell. Thus a paperback of the kind you can guess from the picture of a naked lady on the front will sell in many thousands, bringing the price down to say, £2.50. A book containing exactly the same amount of paper and print or less devoted to less stirring subjects, might be expected to sell only 500 copies and it cannot but cost something between £25 and £30. There are few units to share the overheads.

To add 15 per cent to £2,50 will hardly deter the interested pur-chaser. To add 15 per cent to £30 will make a serious inroad into the limited sums available to scholarly libraries and the even smaller sums disposable by dedicated scholars.

The solution is obvious. If VAT is imposed (which I am not advocating) books published in print-runs of 2,000 or less should be exempt. Reprints would be similarly controlled. Publishers should publish the number of copies printed in an edition (as often in France) and cheating be subject to heavy penalties. Scholarly and scientific books, new poetry and novels would thus not have their publication hindered even more than it is

It is true that many educational institutions can reclaim VAT, though the clerical burden of doing so should not be underestimated. Perhaps the greatest sufferers in general of VAT on all books will be not the publishers but small booksellers. Again, those specialise in small fields will suffer more. A government which encourages small businesses should con-

Getting UK going

From Mr Peter T. Hartill,

Sir. The Government has set its face against any "Keynesian" solution to unemployment on the ground that the 1970s actually produced less employment and near hyper-

However, such a conclusion is erroneous, since conditions have changed markedly since then. The Keynesian theory states, that economy where resources, especially labour, are under-employed will be stimulated to greater economic activity by deficit spending without appreciable inflation. It assumes implicitly the following conditions: 1. There is no mismatch between the demand side and supply side profile in the economy. Movements of labour and capital between companies, sectors and regions are not inhibited by controls, mopoly or inertia.

Unless these conditions are substantially met the stimulus will not work as predicted. Depressions are essential to the creation of these necessary conditions since they force bankruptcy or rationalization on companies making products with a declining demand, or with weak managements and/or with inefficient labour forces, thereby releasing resources for expansion. Since the Second World War. governments have attempted to prevent depressions by Keynesian

Protecting churches

From Mr O. W. H. Clark

Sir, The Chairman of the Redundant Churches Committee of the Church Commissioners, Lord Sandford, is right indeed to applaud (October 3) your perceptive leading article of September 28, on "Protecting the churches." In the faculty jurisdiction

(in the operation of which the Church Commissioners have no standing), the Church of England has a very careful, comprehensive and substantial mechanism of proven worth in application to churches in use.

It has yet to be demonstrated that wider public accountability, denied, as it is claimed, by this "first leg" of the ecclesiastical exemption, would result in a situation more satisfactory in both the pastoral/ liturgical and heritage/resource

Lord Sandford may, however, be on weaker ground when he extends his approval to the "second leg" of the exemption, whereby listed building consent is not required for the demolition of a church by scheme under the Pastoral Measure, 1983. You are not alone, Sir, in questioning whether the Church Commissioners (and I am one of them) should remain the final arbiter in such cases. Whatever the Bridges commission may have thought in 1960 and however good the record of the Church Commissioners (and it is good) in this area, it is significant that the weighty and very recent report of the Chichester com-mission, entitled "The continuing care of the churches and cathedrals", observes (para 300)

Sir, "How long can we wait for jam for tomorrow?" asks the Archbishop. The truth is that the future jam producers, the wealthgenerating industries of tomorrow. will be largely based on new technology using advanced materials developed by research in science and engineering.

The USA understands this, which is why spending on basic research has risen by 40 per cent during the Reagan Administration. Japan understand this, which is why its spending on research has increased by 17 per cent per annum in real terms over the last 20 years. The UK does not understand this, which is why its spending on research has increased by only 3 per cent per annum over the last 20 years, and it is now decreasing in real terms.

It is no coincidence in this technological age that the country with the fastest growth rate in research, Japan, has the lowest percentage unemployment, and the country with the lowest growth rate in research of all major countries, the UK, has the highest unemployment.

I have just returned from visiting the University of Illinois. The materials-research grant income of this one American university is three times that for all the universities in the UK combined. Unless there is a massive increase in UK research funding of those areas of science and engineering of long-term relevance to industrial needs, the wealth-generating industries of tomorrow will not be built in the UK and we will not produce the money to employ people in service industries. (Not only will there never be jam tomorrow, there will not be much bread either, particularly when North Sea oil runs out. The miners' strike dispute is largely irrelevant to future unemployment prospects. However, if there is not a massively increased investment in research the next archbishop will be a voice crying in the UK industrial wilderness. Yours faithfully.

The mill-owner, William Bliss II, achieved much fame by creating the sober-patterned and hard-wearing "Bliss tweed" which became a Victorian household name. He was also one of Britain's very few enlightened employers, receiving an award from Napoleon III of France for his excellent industrial relations. Mrs Carpenter asks if the decaying mill can "be preserved for the nation". It has a preservation order, but an empty building cannot preserve itself. Trial by jury

From Mr Neil Denison, QC Sir. In view of recent press reports of evidence given to the Roskill committee on fraud trials by various bodies opposed to trial by jury, it should be known that the Crimina Bar Association has also submitted evidence to the committee.

The effect of that evidence is that we are opposed to any restriction on the right to trial by jury; we are confident that proper preparation and presentation can make even complicated fraud cases comprehensible to a jury; and we are convinced that should an alternative method of trial be adopted in any class of case it would mark the beginning of the end of the participation of the public in the trial of serious crime.

We do not believe that the problems which may have arisen in a small number of fraud cases could begin to justify such a fundamental change in our criminal procedure. Yours truly,

Is Christianity really true?

There is one great overarching question which, whether they are fully conscious of it or not and whether they have the courage honestly to face it or not, is pressing with greater and greater force upon all the Christian churches today.

It affects every aspect of their thought and life, from the most austerely abstract to the most brutally practical, and although its recognition does not render the traditional controversies between and within the Christian bodies frivolous or otiose, it puts many of them in an entirely new light.

That question can be quite simply stated as follows: Is the Christian religion derived from a revelation given by God in Christ and having an unconditional claim on our obedience, or is it something to be constructed by us in response to our own lesires and the pressures and assumptions of contemporary culture?

It is no valid objection to this formulation to point out that Christians have always tended to give way to their desires and to contemporary cultural influences, and that these have coloured the policies and even the doctrinal utterances of ecclesiastical institutions: what we have today is a situation in which, from within the church itself, the former alternative is widely abandoned or even explicitly denied; and the church's official spokesmen only too often stand aside in an attitude of puzzled helplessness.

And nowhere is this more strikingly and surprisingly exemplified than in the recent history of the Roman Catholic communion. '

After centuries of authoritarian re-pression the Second Vatican Council came as an unexpected and welcome force of liberation, and many scholars who had been under suspicion and even repression found themselves elevated to the honoured status of periti. Systematic and dogmatic theologians on the whole used their new-found freedom with responsibility and restraint, but the same can hardly be said of the Roman Catholic biblical scholars, many of whom, especially in the United States and German-speaking countries, have shown little respect for tradition of any kind.

There was a piquant incident at a conference in Brussels in 1970 when a distinguished Scottish Calvinist theologian accused the organizers of trying to import into modern Roman Catholicism the worst features of nineteenth-century liberal Protestantism.

In fact there is not simply a conflict between two mentalities, one to be described as right-wing cautious con-servative traditional, reactionary and authoritarian, and the other as left-wing. courageous, liberal, radical, progressive and democratic.

There are not just two options in the field but three, and it may be argued that the rightful claimant to the throne formerly occupied by post-Tridentine curialism is not a radical theological liberalism but a renewed and reinvigorated Catholicism, finding its origin in the revelation given by God in Christ and its authentic expression in scripture and the

The failure to recognize this third option can have two quite different consequences. It can on the one hand result in the strengthening of the authoritarian element through sheer terror of the effects of unchecked liberalism. But it can have the opposite result of a virtual surrender of authority to liberalism through fear of the stigma of obscurantism and tyranny.

And this latter has largely come to pass in the United States, where, in addition to every variety of Protestantism from fundamentalism to radical scepticism. there are a number of extremely independent Roman Catholic biblical scholars and where respect for academic freedom has become the first of the commandments, with veneration for democratic processes a close second.

The bishops, while showing a remarkable courage in their utterances on such ethical issues as nuclear armament, have appeared cowed and silent on basic matters of faith.

And the Anglican Church, in spite of honourable pockets of resistance, has seemed only too ready to yield contentedly to the pressures of contemporary secularism and even to see itself as simply a forum for debate on themes of current religious interest. A welcome reaction against this climate of theological defeatism has come with the foundation in July 1981 at Ann Arbor, Michigan, of the Centre of Pastoral Renewal, largely as the result of a conference of 80 scholars and pastoral leaders from Evangelical Protestant and Roman Catholic sources, with a sprinkling of Anglicans, to consider the challenge which contemporary society presents to Christians of all traditions. The two volumes which the centre has produced. Christianity Confronts Mod-ernity and Summons to Faith and Renewal, form in effect a reasoned answer to the question which, at the beginning of this article, I stated as the overarching question for the Christian churches today.

To recognize this does not, of course. solve at one stroke all the issues between Protestantism and Catholicism, for example the classical problem of the relation between scripture and tradition as vehicles of Christian docume; but they appear in a more hopeful light when they are seen within the common acceptance of Christianity as a divine revelation with an

In Britain this repprochement has been less conspicuous as yet, but its signs have begun to appear. It calls for efforts of thought that are both sympathetic and persistent, and is the opposite of that pseudo-ecumenism which treats all differences of belief as unimportant.

In maintaining the primacy of revel-ation we are not retreating into an ivory tower and shutting our eyes to the difficulties, both intellectual and moral, which face the church in the modern world. On the contrary, it is those who capitulate without a struggle to the contemporary environment who demonstrate their moral and intellectual laziness. Some years ago that remarkable Mirfield Father, Lionel Thornton, in his book Revelation and the Modern World posed the question: What is the relation between revealed religion and its cultural environment? He rejected as equally false both the answer that it transcends its environment and the answer that it is the product of its environment. Rather, he maintained. revelation masters its environment, because God has entered into human history and identified himself with it in order to transform it. And that of course, is the meaning of the incarnation.

Science report

Seaweed suffers a sci-fi parasite

A common theme of science fiction involves the invasion of the human body by aliens from outer space. Anyone wondering how it might happen would do well to take a happen would do well to take a careful look at recent research on red algae, a kind of seawend.

Although these plants look harmless on the seashore, something masty can be found lurking among the red algae, Polysiphonia, two American biologists have discovered.

The "something" is a distantly related species of red algae, called

Choreocolex, that is a parasite on

By a Special Correspo According to Dr Linda Goff, of the University of California, and Dr Amette Coleman, of Brown University, Providence, the algal invader takes over genetic control of its host, like a hijacker taking control of an aircraft.

It seems that a cell of the invading algae attaches to a cell of the host, and "drills" holes between the two cells, through the cell walls. The invader then injects its cell nuclei (its control systems) its cell nuclei (its control systems) through the holes into the host

Coleman, say a host cell finishes up with hundreds of invading unclel. There the nuclei stay, often for several weeks, enlarging the host cell as much as 20 times, thickening its cell wall, and occasionally causing it to divide. Quite why the parasite takes over in that way is not clear, other than that it must be a strategy for propagation and survival of the parasite. As to whether the resulting calls should be considered as more Choreccolex or more Polysiphonia, that can be left to the science liction writers.

Cunning runners take to the woods

It is an incongruous sport (if a treasure hunt with map and compass can be called a sport). The race starts when ron are ready, not when the race is ready. And at the end, body and mind aglow with exercise, there is no gauntlet of cheers or jeers. Because the start is staggered. onlookers are unaware of your finishing time, and the winner is not known until the last competitor finishes.

That "sport for all" cliche rings true. Orienteering is conducive to a weekend family outing, being healthy, cheap and fulfilling, not least when the picnic is in sight on return to the glade. And it is increasingly popular - some 250 people had turned out on this, a dark autumnal Sunday, with the forecast indicating rain.

Most of them know the ropes. Orienteering is now well established in Britain, having taken off in the 1960s; there are now about 150 clubs. The general secretary of the 17-yearold British Orienteering Federation is at this event, having driven 100 miles from Derbyshire that morning, it was as well that he was to accompany me. as I had no wish still to be wandering the wood at nightfall. Roy Mason, aged 49, who took a 50 per cent pay cut by abandoning engineering for the great outdoors, is a seven-daysa-week secretary. Either he or the local club - in this instance cr. Maps of the wood had been produced by the club and various trails devised, with the checking-points or "controls" as they are known, inked in. Aware that Times journalists should be capable of finding their way from A to B. if only on the tube. I eschewed the easiest route, with Mason's blessing. Anyway, I assured myself, he was there to hold my hand should I get lost. We opted to set off at 10.50am: a civilized hour. Time to sort out the compass. A compass. indeed! Surely any old fool could steer himself from a rhododendron bush to a shallow pit 400 yards can without difficulty. Maps are contrary and besides, the way to move from one control to another is not to advance in a straight line. "Never aim for the point you want", said Mason. Aim to the side to avoid obstacles.

It is sound advice, although it is not always possible to avoid all obstacles. John Disley, an Olympic bronze medallist at steeple-chasing, and a leading orienteer, was once so immersed in his map-reading that he ran smack into a Land-RovOrienteering offers not only exercise international and world championships, following others or asking the way is only cheating oneself. One might just as well go for an ordinary walk.

Orienteering offers a sense of achievement, as I discovered when left to navigate myself to the last three controls (there were 13 on this four two-and-ahalf mile course). It offers, 100, the solitude of a walk. Different courses and staggered starts it was soon apparent that few meant that the wood never appeared crowded.

> Occasionally, though, a voice could be heard to cry "Daddy, I'm lost", or "Daddy, where are you?" and the Dave Bedford lookalike would shoot past, panting and sweating. The babies and dogs seemed to have vanished. Perhaps they were still struggling with the first control.

For most of these "Happy Herts", orienteering is merely a pastime which they would probably not define, as Hans Bengisson and George Atkinson

In 1900 there was a ski-orienteering meet held in Sweden over a distance of 109 miles. The winning team finished in a time of 28 hours 27 minutes. Orienteering is really exploring. "A scaled-down version of climbing the Himalayas" is how Mason puts it. Orienteers are never happier than when crossing areas which humans may not have set foot upon for months. They do not regard themselves as being entitled to any special privileges, which perhaps explains why there is no record of an orienteer having been shot at by an angry farmer or land-owner. The omens were not propitious when the magnetic needle pointed everywhere but north (I learned later I was holding the compass at the wrong angle) and when congratulating myself on discovering the last-but-one control I found it to be only a temporary lavatory. Some days later, the result came through the post. The winner, an American needless to say, had finished in a time of 44 minutes 18 seconds. Twelve people had been disqualified through missing controls; two were listed as having reured. I was third last, in a time of 145 minutes 26 seconds. I asked the secretary if any competitors had gone missing. He said: may be temporarily unsure of their location-but lost, never".

Orienteering events, defined as controls, there is a choice of four Information Bureau, are often advertised locally. A calendar containing details of meets country-wide and including telephone numbers for inquiries is obtainable from the federation's national office, the address of which is given below.

There are 150 clubs in Britain, which run courses for casnal and expert orienteers. Membership costs approximately £8 for a family and entitles entry to all events and chamnionships, discount purchase of the official magazine. The Orienteer, and voting rights at the national body's annual general meeting. Membership, which like participation is steadily increasing, stands at 13,000 and in 1983 there were 1.091 events with 140,000

Most events take place on Sundays between September and May, some at night. In Scotland six-day events are held. Routes from major roads to the starts are usually signposted with a red and white marker. At the registration point the participant is given a control card, to be punched at each control point, a description sheet for the chosen course giving locations of the controls, and a copy of the event map. The event entry fee is usually 50p to £1.

A course varies in length from just over a mile, with 6 to 10 control points, to more than seven miles. At all events, held in woods, forests, and on heath

If possible, it is always worth studying the map before the start. All orienteering maps are different, reflecting the mapper, local symbols and variations in terrain. It is important to decide which features are reliable enough to be used as checking points round the course.

Outdoor clothes and training or walking shoes should be worn. Shorts are not permitted owing to the risk of infection from bramble scratches. A compass and pen are required, and it is advisable to carry a whistle in case of injury (a first aid unit will be in situ) and agreeable to bring a picnic.

Orienteering books and prod-ucts can be bought from the national office. These include introductions to the sport complete with maps, rules, a book of map symbols and the best-selling Orienteering training and coaching Orienteering world cham-pionships are held every other year. Six representatives from each country competing attend. The next major events to be held in Britain are the British night championships on December 1 at Burnham Beeches, Slough, Berkshire and the four-day international over Easter 1985 at Alnwick, Northumberland. More than 3,000 competitors are expected.

The national office is at British Orienteering Federation, (dept T) Riversdale, Dale Road North, Darley Dale, Matlock, Derbyshire (0629 734042 - 24 hours).

What makes Chris Brasher run? with the best, and turned Metaphorically, a competitive zeal which has driven him in turn to become Olympic gold medallist, BBC's head of general features, sports writer of the year, founder of the London marathon. Literally, at 56 it is what he calls "the best sport invented by man": orienteering. Brasher has always lived life as if there were no tomorrow. Free days are rare, but they are devoted to orienteering either in Richmond Park (where his marathon office is conveniently situated) or at an event he unearths by dialling the telephone service which volunteers news of forthcoming events near London (01-242 2451, evenings and weekends only).

When he was 28 and newly retired from the athletics track. it was suggested that Brasher took up cross-country skiing internationally He felt, though, that he was too old to be able to improve sufficiently to keep up

Following that he helped form the English Orienteering Federation, who sent a team to the 1966 world championships. Six men competed in the individual event over nine miles of tough country in Finland and finished in the bottom third of 60 entrants. But all six completed the course within the four-hour limit and the British have improved since then.

Now, the priority was finance. It was and still is forthcoming from the Sports Council - their grant currently runs at £90,000 a year - and help also came from a rich associate of the then Prime Minister Harold Wilson. Minister Harold Wilson. Brasher recalled: "John Disley

Too generous a dose might unbinge a fellow's reason; and then I read in the Brighton Evening Argus that many a true word . . . for there, on page one. were reports of two brutal local murders on the same day. As I waited in the early, early morning for John George Humphrey, "a fisherman since he could walk", I watched a tramp forage among the dust-bins, as foxes do in sleek suburbs. I watched a road-sweeper. Lewis Wilson by name, doing our dirty work; there is something hideously vicarious in witnessing our own droppings cleared up. "They do it right in front of you, bottles, cigarette packets, fish and chip wrapping. People are filthy", he told me "I are filthy", he

John George said that his is the only fishing boat outside the marina these days. He took a swipe at Brighton Council; "Used to row the kiddies up and down, 20 yards out, so they could wave to dad. Then the council told me I'd have to get insurance, life-jackets, flares to be legal ... idiots." The council is everybody's whipping-boy. If the sun shines, it's an act of God: if it pours, it's the council's fault. It is in the nature of things. So the marvellous state of preservation of Royal Crescent, the immaculate condition of the parks and leafy walks, are all maintained by grace, where the paint peels in othre leprosy, where there is shameful demolition-it is the council's fault

Who takes credit for the tempo, the mood, is harder to define. Brighton was incubated in a raffish atmosphere, and somehow it has stuck. Gone are the days of "... and, my lord, I observed the defendant signing the register at the Metropole ...", for the reason that the dirty weekend has become a social anachronism. But doingthings-differently is in the blood. Being a bit flash (arantgarde, to use a more acceptable term), is part of the inheritance: the King is dead, long live

It was all quite inoffensive, if a little self-conscious, a little contrived. Which is the last one could say of Winnie Sexton, landlady of The Cricketers, thank you very much, dear. She wore a colourful, billowing dress and her hair had just been done at Angela's, so her complexion had that slightly lobster, justout-of-the-dryer hue. Winnie, who at the end of the war was "in Baker Street, dear, hush-hush, you know", smokes 60 fags a day, drinks gin and water, and is my favourite publican.

The Cricketers is all maroon. maroon flock wall-paper, maroon velvet chairs. Men customers wear blazers with the badge of The Queen's Regi-ment; women with throaty voices perch on bar stools. "Cheers, my love", said Winnie, "Did I tell you that Graham Travels with my Aunt? - He's a lovely man, not that we should mention names, dear, should

They say that Brighton is "rich in characters", whatever that may mean; yet some of the breed have faded away, become part of folklore. Like the archetypal seaside landlady, all curiers and refernments. "Oh no, dear", said Winnie archly, the boarding houses are run by pairs of nice young men. You know what I mean, dear?"

That's something I noticed about Brighton: no one is frightened of striking attitudes, they've all got something to say, good or bad. Gavin Henderson, artistic director of Brighton Festival: "It's a lively, gregarious place, you don't have to be on your best behaviour. It is a town of extremes, there are twilight ways of making a living that make Rachmanism look like the Guinness Housing Trust. Then there are the forgotten poor.

"They're a proud, curiously snobbish audience a 'prior to London production' possessiveness takes hold." Marion Waller, principal keeper of antiquities at Brighton Museum: "It's a come-and-go town, untypical, unsettled." By "come-and-go" did she refer to the 17,000 London commuters, foreign language students, con-ventioneers, holiday-makers, day-trippers, or to a state of mind? I searched for an answer on Palace Pier, among the candy-floss and jellied ecls. The "Grossly Overweight Band" appeared at 2pm and the sun disappeared, digested by the horizon, a good deal later, and still I hadn't got my answer.

So next morning I consulted someone well skilled in divination: I called on Romany clairvoyant, Eva Petulengro. She was younger than I expected, not at all like Madame Arcati. She said that Brighton has not changed with the years and never would, it was a theatrical town, born of intrigue, intriguing still.

On reflection, I suspect that I was being too carnest about Brighton, chatting away to clerics, clairvoyants, keepers of antiquities . . . when the real answers are right there on the beach, among the deck-chairs where Mum is zizzing, her thighs ajar a fraction too wide for decorum. This is where the cternal scaside verities lie; along with "Roll out the Barrel" at the boozer, the "Valeta" at the pally, sandwiches made of Hovis and sweet dreams with Ovaltine. The Financial Times index might get drowned at sea, but nothing's going to spoil the taste of Brighton rock.

Haven with occupational hazards

On a divided island.

Keith Spence discovers that north

Cyprus has the best of the bargain

for tourists

A such golden stone of Bellapais Abbey bakes in the afternoon sun, you can sit beside it and drink under the Tree of Idleness, as Lawrence Durrell did when he fell in love with Cyprus 30 years ago. Many things have changed since Durrell's time. The windows of the abbey's lofty refectory still look out across a grey-green sea of olives to the incomparable blue of the Mediterranean; but now the red flag of Turkey flaps languidly above the entrance tower. Bellapais has been translated to Bellabayis, and the white-haired old men in the cases chai together in Turkish.

Ten years after the invasion of Cyprus by the Turkish army, and the division of the island into a Greek southern part and a Turkish northern third, the Turks are at last starting to reestablish some kind of tourist trade. This has not been an easy matter, as north Cyprus, or Kibris as the Turks call it, has been internationally ostracized, more especially since last year's declaration of UDI by the north Cypriots.

My visit to Cyprus in June was my third. The first had been in 1969, when the island was still an uneasy unity. I went again in 1979 to Greek Cyprus; and this third trip gave me a chance to see the Turkish side of the picture. I also wanted to track down old friends, among them a family of Turkish farmers who had been hounded at Greek gunpoint from their homes near Paphos during the carlier "troubles" in 1964, and uprooted once more 10 years later, to make a new home in the north. Fortunately, I found them all alive and well in a village outside Kyrenia.

concerned, the Turks have got the best of the bargain. South Cyprus has nothing to compare with the Kyrenia mountain range which, for all its small size, must rank among the world's most beautiful ranges, stretches stopping is forbidden with is jagged crest of rocks that for security reasons. But most of the lower slopes.

Kyrenia (now Girne) harbour is as delightful as ever, fringed with restaurants and dominated by the great block of its Venetian fortress. The three superb Crusader castles - St Hilarion, Buffavento and Kantara - all lie along the mountain range; and the Turks now have the finest of Cyprus's ancient sites, in the Greco-Roman city of Salamis, and the mysterious palace of Vouni, poised breathtakingly high above the sea. The sandy beaches near Kyrenia and Salamis are well maintained, though the further you get from these centres, the more plastic bottles and oil you tend to find.

Potential visitors to north Cyprus are often put off by reports that it has been turned into a huge armed camp, with the Turkish army poised in a state of battle-readiness, prepared to shoot on sight. It is true that there are plenty of troops about - in Kyrenia you can see them saluting the As far as scenic beauty is seafront statue of Ataturk at sunset, and one of the best of the beaches (formerly Six Mile Beach) is kept for their use. Outside the towns there are camps every few miles along the main roads, and on certain ne thing that has not changed from the old days is the overwhelming friendliness of the Turkish Cypriots. When you sit down in a coffee-shop the locals offer you tumblers of raki and crowd round to tell you about their relatives in Britain, and ask if you have been to their old home villages in the south, which none of them has seen for 10 years. Nearly all of them have Greek friends on the other side, from whom they are totally cut off, as the Greek authorities allow no communication either face to face, by letter or telephone between the two Cypruses.

One day we drove south-east to see the desolation that was once the boom resort of Varosha, as Famagusta's version of Benidorm was called. Now Varosha (Marash in Turkish) is an uninhabited noman's land. The elegant Greekowned villas are in decay behind a ramshackle barrier of wire, while the empty shells of the luxury hotels stride south down the beach, like a city struck by a neutron bomb.

I was told that Varosha is glow orange-red in the evening the sentries on duty are bored- used by both sides as a pawn in sun, or vanish into the mists looking national servicemen some kind of international that hang among the trees on wilting in the heat, hardly able game, but to me it was a some kind of international pathetic and dispiriting sight, since I had last seen it 15 years ago, in its flourishing heyday. As for old Famagusta (now Gazi Magusha), with its battered mosque and sunscorched appearance, it looked just as decayed and unloved as ever.

Back in Kyrenia. the waterfront restaurants, as smart and clean as any in the Mediter ranean, wait for customers and are three quarters empty, even in the high season. Few tourists mean little money - money to clean more of the beaches, to maintain and restore the antiquities, to improve the often appalling roads, to modernize the hotels.

But one thing that comparative poverty has done is to keep north Cyprus from being ruined, as much of the south of the island has been, by new high-rise hotels and the other trappings of tourism, though it may not be much consolation for the north Cypriots.

There are no direct flights to north Cyprus. The only carrier is Turkish Airlines, either changing flights at Istanbul, or touching down briefly at izmir. Hydrofoil to Kyrenia from the Turkish mainland (two hours). Package firms which organize tours there include Eastmed olidays, 4 Edenhurst Avenue Hurlingham, London SW6 (01-736 3620), which offers a fortnight's self-catering in a studio flat in the Ambelia Holiday Village above Bellapais for £172 per head in the off season. In the high season the off season. In the high season the price is about double that. Other four operators are: CTA Holidays, 28 Cockspur Street, London SW1 (930 4853); Celebrity Holidays and Travel, 18 Frith Street, London W1 (439 1961); Prime Travel, 23 Park Mont Avenue, Baildon, Shipley, Bradford BD17 (0274 580626); Dolphin Salling, St John's House, 84 High Street, Huntingdon (0480 411999). Currency is in Turkish tira (TL). Dinner in a restaurant averages 2,000TL (24) a head, wine and 2.000TL (£4) a head, wine and brandy included. Car hire is from £7

Thomas Cook travel agency chain has published a 40-page guide to holiday resorts in Spain, Greece, Portugal, Yugoslavia, Malta and Austria. It gives useful advice on which resorts are lively and which are quiet, and on the areas with the best or worst beaches. It also compares the prices of everyday purchases in the various destination countries. The guide is available free of charge from all Thomas Cook branches.

Summer surcharges

The latest package-tour oper-ators to publish programmes for next summer have followed the lead of Thomson and Horizon by reserving the right to impose surcharges to cover adverse movements in currency exchange rates or increases in the cost of aviation fuel.

But unlike its competitors. Thomas Cook Holidays, while warning that there may be surcharges up to a ceiling of 10 per cent of the basic price, will allow customers to cancel without penalty if the surcharge exceeds 5 per cent. Yugotours. which publishes its programme next week is expected to limit any surcharges to £10 per head. which on a typical two-week high-season holiday would be equivalent to about 3 per cent.

Pernettya-

from South America

Pernettya is an evergreen shrub grown not only for its very attractive foliage, but also for its colourful fruits - berries which can be half an inch or more in diameter and range in colour from white through to pink, purple and almost black.

The usual form grown in gardens is P mucronata, which has male and female plants, so it is necessary to plant both forms to get the best from it. Pollination should be high on your list of priorities -as a general rule Pernettya should be planted in clumps because although plants may appear to have proper flowers, they do not function as such and must be planted with forms capable of bearing the right kind of pollen. Although they need to be planted in groups they are still effective in small gardens.

Pernettya should be kept away from alkaline soils. It prefers a lime free soil and a moist, peary loam is ideal, but do not be put off growing it if the soil is not perfect. Dry areas are not recommended.

South American in origin, the shrub is named after Antoine Joseph Pernetty, who accompanied Bougainville, the French navigator, on his expedition to that continent in the mid-eighteenth century. Not surprising, then, that Pernettya flowers and fruits better in full sun. If grown in shade it makes a good ground cover plant although it flowers very little, and is inclined to be etiolated, but unless the shade is very donse the plants will survive. P mucronata is a spreading shrub which grows to about 4ft high according to the depth of shade but a shrub in full sunlight can be expected to grow between 2 and 3 ft high. Its spreading habit will eventually form the plant into a dense thicket in which leaves and paper can get caught, making it look a little scruffy. Regular picking over will keep the plant looking clean and tidy.

Leaves are small, shiny and sharply pointed and white flowers, formed singly in the axils of the leaves near the tip of the shoots, appear in May. Fruits follow and these are formed quite early, in some cases as soon as August. Fortunately, birds do not seem to be very keen on them so they survive well into the winter. Sometimes the fruits are hidden in the foliage because of the dense habit of the plant, but a few cuts with a pair of secateurs will soon alter

Being evergreen, the plants are best planted during the late autumn/early winter or during the late spring/early summer. Prepare well and they can be moved without causing any distress. Good quality container-grown plants can be planted at any time of the year, providing this is done with care.

Pruning is not required often, but should the plant become too unruly or large then use a knife to trith it back to shape. Neglected plants can be cut back into hard wood in the late winter Propagation is by seed for Paraicronata but named varieties do not come true to seed and require vegetative propagation.

Although P invironata is a pleasant shrub the forms are better; there is a wide range of these and they are usually given names according to the colour of the fruits. P in alba has white berries, P m atrococcinea has readish purple fruits, P m Bells Seedling has very shiny berries which are an attractive shade of deep pink. The prices depend on quality but I would expect to pay about £4.50 per plant.

Lessons for lawns Depending upon the weather and how well the grass is growing, the last cut of the year will come some time this month. If the weather stays warm and fairly mild, continue to cut - but drop the roller on your mower and take off less than you have been during the period of vigorous growth. It is unwise to scalp the grass at this time of year. Winter cutting should mean leaving grass between three quarters of an inch and one inch quarters of an inch and one inch long.

Now is the time to give the lawn an organic top dressing if it needs it and it usually does. First, though, a compacted lawn surface needs breaking up, and the best way is to spike – or "tine" – the grass. There are two available methods a solid tining and hollow tining. The first involves driving a spike into the soil to make a hole between 4 and 6 in deep and just under ½in in diameter. Hollow tining means using a special spike with a hollow centre. Pushed into the lawn, it fills with soil; from then on, successive cores of soil are driven out with every thrust. Holes should be made every thrust. Holes should be made about 6in apart. Annual hollow tining is not recommended; it is necessary only bout once every five years. Solid tining can be carried out every year if the ground looks as though it needs it, and can be done with a fork or tining implement. Apply a fine top dressing evenly about %in deep. The back of the rake is an ideal tool for spreading the dressing into the holes. This should be completed by late Oct.

Raspberry rows

Even in mild areas winter

Growth in raspberries has stopped and the foliage is beginning to fall. Pruning should have been carried out when the plants stopped fruiting so good strong shoots remain. To make new rows, find the shoots which have come up away from the rows, but are strong and healthy. Prepare for new rows by double much farmvard manure as possible. Dig out the top soil and trien fork through the second spit; once broken up add the manure and fork it in. If farmyard manure is not available add as much wellrotted compost as is available, then root system. Lift the shoots carefully, to ensure that you do not damage the shoot near to its base. Planting is the next step, but as the ground is prepared it should not take too long. The distance between the plants depends upon the vigour of the variety. Two feet is usual, but with varieties which are less vigorous, or those who throw up fewer shoots, it may be necessary to reduce the spacing to add bonemeal at about 4oz to the square yard. Rake this into the top inch or so of the trench. You are now ready to plant.

The shoots selected to be lifted should be dug round. Remember the shoot has come from one or other of the rows and this runner will have to be cut. If it is not severed, as you lift the shoot, the runner could damage the sucker's

Ensure that the roots are about 1in deeper than they were when lifted. Use the heel to firm in the plants. They should not be in loose pround, which produces the wrong and of growth. After planting, cut back the shoots to about 8 or 9 in above ground

Hang geraniums

The best way to keep geraniums: over winter is in a box or a pot in a temperature of not less than 45°F. They must have good light and be kept just moist. This requires a conservatory or a greenhouse because as a rule sheds or outhouses are too dark: Where a greenhouse is available take cuttings up to October. Temperature and light are again of ost importance. Th should be on an open bench getting what light is available. The young plants should be grown as hard as you can make them. Soft sappy plants are prone to disease and they do not stand much chance of getting through the cold weather.

A way to try, and this is not foolproof, is to lift strong, healthy plants, tie them lightly in bundles and place them lift a frost-free shed and place them in a most-free sned or garage. Hang them upside down from the roof in a place where they get good light. As the leaves curl and die they should be removed. There should be some atmospheric moisture to keep the plants turgid. Losses are quite high but if you manage to get a few plants through winter, spring cuttings grow well. Another way is to lift plants and to cut them back to sound, riperied wood and plant in boxes filled with soilless composts. Keep this moist and place them on a window still. So

A toast to

My heart sank when I saw the invitation to an "oak aging seminar"; it sounded a pretty dreary sort of event. But it extensive research programme on the effect of wood on wine.

Back in 1966, when Bob Mondavi founded his winery, he had already realized that California's traditional large redwood tanks were not the ideal medium in which to age fine wine and had switched to small oak barrels bought from the Bordeaux firm of Demptos. By the early 1970s the Mondavi team had worked out that certain grape varieties were better suited to (and rapidly picked up a fine oak flavour from) the coarse open-grain oak grown in the warm Limousin forest to the north east of Bordeaux; others fared better in the close-grained oak from the cooler Nevers forest close to Sancerre on the Loire.

Within a few years the Mondavis started to suspect that it was not just the variety of oak that mattered but the way in which the barrel was coopered; so in 1977 they put their theory to the test and asked a French cooper to make a barrel out of American oak, using the traditional French method. This involves hand splitting and planing the oak before bending each stave into Fashion phones are the buzz words in telecommunication. They hang on the wall or on your belt, they are shaped like genies' lamps or Mickey mice, you can shout at them from a distance or tune them to a whisper and you can have any colour you like as long as it's not black. That is the theory. In practice manufacturers' telephones is very basic – neutrals and primaries that have little to do with fashionable furnishing The more unusual colours tend to be in unapproved telephones, whose sales are suffering in the price war which has brought many more approved models within reach.

"The market has gone to approved telephones much more than I expected - they are now the majority of our sales", says Nick Pearce, whose shop, The Telephone Box was the first to specialize in decorative telephones when it opened in Chelsea in 1980. He now has three more branches in London

He stocks more than 70 styles of domestic telephones, mem-ory and "hands free" office telephones, cordless models and answering machines and even this is only a selection of the styles available. Most popular sellers are at opposite ends of the price range - the push-but-ton one-piece telephones at £29.95 and the luxury cordless models at about £160 but special purpose styles are being introduced almost every month and by November there will be a model called the Big Button which will make dialling easier for those with arthritic handst.

What you get for your money varies consider-ably. For £29.95 you can get three good-looking, one-piece phones, all approved. British Telecom's Slimtel (off white only). Betacom's Fla-mingo (ivory, red, brown, blue and the only black I have seen) and Dialatron's Rumour 10 (ivory, burgundy, grey, yellow to come) all have mute control (microphone cut-out to prevent the caller hearing your rude remarks) and last number

But while the Flamingo includes a wall-mounting holster in the price, this is an optional extra for Slimtel and Rumour. On the other hand, Rumour 10 has a 10-number memory for which you usually pay another £10 or so - it automatically dials any of 10 numbers of your choice at the touch of one button.

EATING OUT

Socket to the plug

All new Telecom installations are plug-and-socket and if something irreparable goes wrong with an existing wire-in-the-wall system a socket is installed and the instrument converted with a plug at no extra charge. The push-button Statesman telephone can be supplied at the same rental as the old circular dial instrument, depending on availability.

If you have a standard

phone and fancy something smarter your present system can be converted to plug and socket. The conversion charge is £17.25 including VAT (Telecom always quote ex VAT) which covers the conversion of the main instru-ment and however many extensions are already in the house. The charge will rise in November, but has not yet been decided.

lf, however, you want extra sockets added to your system this is charged as an installation. The first socket in a new installation (that is for the main instrument) costs £17.25 and the first extension socket £14.95. These prices will remain the same in November. At the moment each subsequent extension socket costs a further £13.80 and this will rise in November to .01.613

To arrange a new installation or conversion contact your local Telesales office - a Freephone connexion through the operator. You will be sent a form and a suggested date for the engineer to call - in theory about three to four weeks from your inquiry.

My experience was less efficient. It took five calls before I got through to the Coventry switchboard and three more five-minute waits before I reached the sales department. A form promised but a week later had not arrived. More calls prowere waiting for leasters with the new prices. I am still formless and dateless, telephonically speaking.

When the engineer does call I am told there will be very little mess. The sockets are small and neat and even a new installation is unlikely to take more than an hour and a conversion about half an hour. Any drilling is made good and where wires cannot be tucked under carpet they are run unobtrusively along skirtings.

At the moment you can buy any number of extension phones without paying extra rental and after privatization in January 1985 you will no longer be required to rent any instrument from Telecom, but you will still have to rent a line. You will be able to ask Telecom to take back their model and buy whatever style you like. But don't expect a big reduction in your quarterly bill as the cost of the instrument is a small proportion of the £60.60 annual success: more than five million cars will be equipped by 1990. Each of the partnerships which has Burgundian grapes like the Pinot Noir and Chardonnay benefited greatly from heavily been given licences to operate in Britain expects to move into profit after an initial outlay of nearly £25m over the first three years; by the end of the decade they expect toasted barrels. Through instinct rather than research, perhaps the French had already recognized this: the traditional Burgundy barrel is made from thicker staves than profits of about £40m. The prospects are equally bright for the consumers – their costs will that of a Bordeaux cask and, in order to bend the wood suffficiently, the Burgundians he halved. But for British industry the news is not so good; both partnerships will

From January thousands more motorists will be able to make phone calls on the move over a much wider sweep of the country and at half the current cost. The system which will bring about this dramatic revokution in . communications is called Cellular Radio. As the term suggests the country will be divided like a giant honeycomb into "cells", or small areas, which will all have their own VHF radio channels. Each area will contain a radio transmitter to relay the phone signals and because the cells are computer controlled, the car will automatically change from one frequency to another as it The key feature of the new design is that it allows many callers to use the same frequencies at the same time, thus increasing the number of calls the system can handle from today's limit of 1,500 an hour to 50,000 an hour. Consequently, the number of users is expected to shoot up to about 60,000 by the end of 1985 - more than six times the number who make use of the current mobile radio telephone system. By 1990 more than 500,000 cars will be able to be equipped with telephone: compared with about 20,000 today. The present long waiting lists for the machines will be greatly reduced (in London alone there is always a queue of about 2,000).

Cellular radio will be operated by two partnerships: British Telecom and Securicor will be setting up

Hooked on a cunning gadget

Surely the most effective birth control device employed in Victorian England was the humble button. Women's bodies' were padlocked behind rows of them, each so tiny and tight that no mere fumble in the dark would unlock the key to the fleshly pleasures, and so many that by the time the last straining fastener had been levered from its loop, all the participants were probably ready for was a stiff cup of Dr Wolstenholme's Patent Invigorating Beef Tea. Only the fact that everybody carried a buttonhook ensured that the birthrate continued its Victorians never did anything with their hands that could be accomplished by a gadget. A buttonhook is a hook is a hook; the variety comes in their handles and decoration. You can guess the next bit: somehody has formed a society to collect them. Since its formation in 1979 the Buttonbook Society has attracted 200 members, and is staging an exhibition of more than 1,000 button hooks, from the prosaically straightforward to the devilishly cunning folding model with the built-in shochorn, at the Warwickshire County Museum in Warwick. The buttonhook was dealt a mortal blow by the First World War, when fashion and necessity combined to dictate that women dress more practically. It enjoyed a revival during the 1920s, fastening single-bar but-ton shoes for women and spats and gaiters for men. At this stage of the year, money may not appear to be too much of a problem (just wait until February!) and parents' attention and pliability at a premium, the more expensive Cambridge restaurants come within range.

Cambridge now boasts at least three fairly up-market restaurants of which Jean Louis, just across the road from Magdalene College, is the most recent. Smartly turned out, with lemon colours, bright spot-lights, and pine floors dominating the decor, Jean Louis looks like an Italian trattoria.

Rugged starters include jambon de bayonne and avocado filled with crabmeat, as well as escargots à la crème (in cream and brandy sauce £3.40), which is as rich and as filling as it sounds. The light relief seemingly offered by poached baby turbot in a Hollandaise sauce (£7.10, excluding vegetables) is illusory, since the large chunk of fish arrives in a scalding hot dish, swamped by the sauce. With daily specials such as grouse in raisin sauce, little escape from the prevailing richness is possible. Set lunches may offer a lighter, certainly cheaper prospect; otherwise, expect your parents to pay around £15 a head.

Precision needed to beat the blocks

One of the most frustrating and undignified experiences for declarer is to find that he has the Borgias. the 05 to dummy's 00. The second round of diamonds revealed the bad break. Deciarer's careless retention of the $10 had fatally blocked the suit. The correct technique should be routine. Start the suit by playing the $10, winning with one of dummy's honours and VK. In this example it would have sufficed to cash the OK and continue with the $10, but sometimes a shortage of entries demands precise play. Rubber bridge. North-South game. Dealer East.

The only virtue of South's bidding was that it fortuitously led to the best contract.

He won the lead in dummy and returned to his hand with the $K, eyeing East's $10 as if it were a chalice proffered by approval at his own prescience

when East discarded a spade. There was a pause before the horrible truth dawned on him; his own #9 and #8 created an internal block in the suit. In a last desperate throw he tried the diamonds. It was no more than justice that East's QJ98 should thwart that plan.

You will notice that if declarer starts the clubs from his hand, the failure to play the $9 or $8 rather than the $3 could provide him with an awkward decision if West plays the #Q. If the #Q is a true card he must finesse the 49 on the way back to avoid the block. But if West has played the Q from the Q 10, declarer would feel rather stupid when his finesse of the 49 loses to the

North's raise to two no trumps is an imaginative effort which led to a good game. Declarer ducked the opening lead and took the second round with his ΦA . He calculated that to justify his vulnerable inter-vention West might possibly have a shortage somewhere. So he played the $8 to dummy's O and continued with the eight of spades, disembarrassing himself of the inconvenient 09. West was welcome to enjoy his spades, because declarer was now sure that he could make fine diamond tricks.

Bristol Festival for Children

Dance, drawing, drama and drums

The British are not at all bad at mounting festivals – we have a long tradition of doing so – but we lag behind many countries in the extent to which they cater for children. Next week, Bristol hopes to change all that: for the first time ever in Britain, the city is mounting a festival for children which begins tomorrow and continues throughout the week until October 21. The programme is impressive. Every day there will be a wide a range of concerts, workshops and exhibitions. mostly during the day at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, On Tuesday, for example, there will be workshops on Afro-Carib-bean dance and drums, calligraphy, photography, book illustration, drawing, extemporary dance, synthesizing, video news making, plus a "book safari", story-telling, "hands-on" sci-ence with the Bristol Exploratory and the official opening of a children's book fair.

On Tuesday evening there is a family concert - Ekome & Dartington Gamelan, performed by the Ekome National Dance Company and exponents of the Gamelan - a set of highly original Balinese musical instruments.

So far, so busy. But there is one potentially serious problem: how will children, all supposedly at school, get to any of the workshops? The answer depends on whether their schools, all of which were do so. This week has been as John Fisher, the artistic director, says: "It is the last pleased. before half-term, when Christmas activities are not yet underway and preparation for most exams has not yet started in earnest". Having studied the programme, my impression is that the festival is geared very largely to traditional activities drawing, painting, classical or ethnic music - but that some concessions to topical interests have been made, such as the workshops using video machines, synthesisers and externporary dance techiques.

And on the last Sunday of the festival, 20 young people between the ages of 12 and 18 will undertake the final editing of their 20-minute video docu mentary about the aims and achievements of the festival. I felt there could have been more of these kinds of activity, and next year, Henrietta Etherington, coordinator of bookings and workshops, and wife of Robert Etherington, the festi-val's administrative director hopes there will be more "modern" workshops: "After all, backing tracks aren't made up of violing!" she said, "and I would like to see more body popping and breaking workshops-after all that's what a huge number of children are involved with today. But you know how hard it is to get new ideas across ...

"We would love to have pulled off a rock concert", said John Fisher. "and to have had for more fringe events. Next year I hope for a really active fringe and I believe it will happen. But our real ambition is to let children know what don't care if a child says ' prefer popping preference is all-but I want him to say that once he knows what all the alternatives are.

Since then passions have cooled the Government has allowed the sinking of a shaft at Asfordby, and the Duke of Rutland has reneged on his yow to lie down in the path of the first bulldozer to desecrate the site. In fairness to the objectors one should add that one of their main fears concerned the dumping of spoil in the surrounding countryside. The idea, which they mooted at the inquiry in 1979, was that it should be transported to Bedfordshire and Northampton-shire and used to fill in and reclaim the disused clay pits excavated by the brick industry. At the time it seemed an ideal solution; the removal of existing or potential eyesores at either end, and the restoration and protection of valuable farmland. But the Department of the Environment has just con-cluded that it could not be economically justified, despite the estimate from its own working party that it would add, at most, £2.50 a tonne to the National Coal Board's costs. Fionn Holford-Walker, sec-

Harrowing time

After such a wonderfully dry summer, in which not even the Test matches were affected by rain (alas, poor Gower), it was tough luck that the monsoons should arrive a week before the world ploughing championships near Horncastle, in Lincolnshire.

The competitors from 24 countries, including a woman from Yugoslavia, seemed sur-prisingly able to cope with the conditions, fashioning their furrows with exquisite precision. Not so the spectators and would-be spectators, who spent hours stuck in traffic jams only to find themselves stuck even more inextricably in a sea of hubcap-deep mud.

The Foxglove Sage by Auberon Waugh (Robin Clark, 4.95), Consider the Lilles by Auberon Waugh (Robin Clark, 24.95)

Auberon Waugh recently lamented that school fees and the other exigencies of middle-class life have forced him intolucrative journalism and away from profounder but less profitable prose. It's a cri de coeur which has echoed round many a lachrymose lunchtime in El Vino's. But in the case of Waugh minor, there is evidence to prove that his alter, more literary, ego is alive and well.

He has written four novels in his time, three of which have flowers in the title - curiously appropriate for one who writes like a butterfly and stings like a bee. The pair above are probably the best known.

Exhibit one: Having read most of his old man's output I turned to The Foxglove Saga in 1960 with something of the excitement felt by Keats on thumbing through Chapman's Homer (contributors to Pseuds' Corner, sharpen your scissors). Nor was I disappointed I thought at the time that it was underrated by the critics, including our own, and on rereading it a quarter of a century later am confirmed in that view. er.

Tales of tarnished hope and faded freedom

Fiction

A Wreath of Roses by Elizabeth

Taylor (Penguin, £2.95) This is a collection of faded hopes. In the first chapter a man throws himself under a train and on the last page another, in the same station, finds all hope is lost. Between these desolate scenes the lives of three women demonstrate those moments when expectations of happiness die. Liz realizes she will never really like her husband; Camilla knows that she will never have a husband; and Frances sees that she is now too old to develop her talent for painting. Life has become suddenly shabby for all of them. Every shade of gloom is precisely labelled and defined, but in the process the characters themselves become strangely dim-

Oxbridge Blues by Frederic Raphael (Penguin, £1,95)

In Glinering Prizes Frederic Raphael described that moment of freedom when everything looks possible to people struggling out of the chrysalis of a prolonged and privileged education. In the short stories here collected under the title "Oxbridge Blues" he describes the them) that publishers still have moment when freedom is seen confidence in the market for to have gone, or perhaps never to have existed. They depend for excitement on love affairs, on houses and holidays and on fashionable attitudes which they can swop around among themselves like cards. It is a brittle world but it has its own appeal. And it is always stylish.

Scandal by A. N. Wilson (Penguin,

And why do the House of Commons tearpoms or constituency iumble sales seem to provide manner. General readers or suitable settings for men of power? Although Derek Blore, an MP, is himself a naive rapidly with a large number of hustoon, the trappings of his Arabic terms and unfamiliar public life are treated with a concepts, and to cope with surprising amount of respect. In contrast, his private life, which consists largely of visits to a stow-witted prostitute in Stoke Newington, is wildly unhinged. The two sides of his life produce some hectic Whitehall farce with some wryr, spry satire

Doctor Fischer of Geneva or the Bomb Party by Graham Greene (Penguin, £1.25)

This is a very slight novel but it is heavy with that sort of depression usually associated with the end of an over-lavish Christmas when the children start actually to quarrel over the presents. Graham Greene knows how to tell an elegant tale. The set pieces, like the scene in which guests at a dinner plough through cold porridge while their host eats caviare, are masterly. They are much more effective in the than in the recent television production, but even in the book there is something missing. If the hypothesis that the richer people are, the greedier they are is true, it is interesting enough to deserve cither more realistic or more consistently bizarre treatment. We don't see enough of Dr Fischer to hate him properly as a person, por is his behaviour sufficiently fabulous to make the

Mrs Pooter's Diary by Keith Waterhouse (Black Swan, £2.50)

The Diary of a Nobody has always been much loved. Mr Pooter has become a friend because he tries hard but gets things wrong. Keith Waterhouse has obviously had a lot of fun the Naismiths' vision of the Pooter household by providing the diary. Mrs Pooter might have written to accompany her husband's. It is eleverly done. exact in all its details and true in tone, but it is a strange sort of literary exercise. Mrs Pooter already emerges so clearly from the pages of her husband's diary that only the real addicts will want to know more.

Disappearing acts in the Stubbs story

One disappearance, only lately detected, was due to the Musters of Colwick Hall discovered that she had been having an affair with someone clse. He ordered Stubbs to paint both of them out. Later, someone added what Ms Egerton calls "two spindly grooms" leading the now bare-backed steeds. All this made a nonsense of Stubbs's fine composition: there were yards of sky, no sign of Sophia's winsome face (which unlike her husband's looked out at the viewer), and, most important, nothing left of her glorious red gown, one of the strongest elements.

Some of the blame for the Close by is a small painting intentionally devoid of either damage suffered by his pictures must be laid at Stubbs's door, horse or human: a beautifully for many of his wonderful images are made of stuff too frail for this rough world", says executed aide-memoire of Newmarket Heath. "Ants? Green ants? Dreaming here?" shouts an Australian redneck, employed by a mining company determined to dis cover uranium on land sacred to the Aborigines. "Why can't they dream somewhere else?" The question is addressed to Lance Hackett, a lanky geologist, although the person best placed to answer is the film director Werner Herzog, who created the dreaming ants. Where the Green Ants Dream is Herzog's thirteenth feature film and like its predecessors draws strength from the land-scapes and legends of countries far from his native Germany. No ants, Herzog declared in an interview, are completely green.

"The tail is green, but the rest is brown. And all the things you learn about green ants, is of course invented." But they are invented for a specific purpose.

Although Herzog wanted to confront the mystery of Aboriginal culture, he was anxious not to encroach too closely on the people's beliefs and their daily struggles: "I couldn't claim to make their cause my cause; that would be ridiculous". It also smoothed the path to production if he could rade the Aborigines among persuade the Aborigines among companies in North-west Aushis cast that they were acting a tralia; the ethnographical docupant, outside their real life.

Where the Lawson pension axe may fall

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer embarked on his radical reform of the tax system last March. "a programme for a Parliament", as he reminded us this week. it did not take long for the pensions industry to start looking anxiously over its shoulder. The Treasury showed in Mr Lawson's first Budget that it could tackle the life insurance industry. After abolishing tax relief on insurance premiums removing or reducing fax relief on savings for old age seemed only a modest next Conservative MP Mr Robert McCrindle, who is parliamentary adviser to the British Insurance Brokers' Association. warned last April that the more obvious abuses of tax concessions on pensions. including loan and mortgage schemes, could provide the Treasury with a good excuse to take away the tax relief on pensions. There was a boom in the sale of personal pension plans, together with gloomy stories suggesting that all tax relief on pensions could be cut away by the reforming Mr Lawson.

Now it appears that there may have been a lot of fuss about very little. Mr John Kay, the director of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, has been examining the Treasury's scope for action on pensions. His feeling is that any Treasury-inspired pensions revolution is likely to be a minor

The three areas for possible changes, in his view, are tax free lump sums taken on retirement, employers' and employees contributions (including those of the selfemployed), and pension funds' income. The second, he suggests, will not be touched at all, leaving tax relief on pension contributions intact.

Two measures that are likely are first transitional arrangements for taxing lump sums, probably taking the tax on the "commutated" portion up to the basic rate of income tax over several years, second interestingly, a new tax on pension fund income. Mr Kay says that a rate of 10 per cent could be applied to pension fund dividend income, which would work its way through to more expensive pensions over a number of years.

There is an important IFS health warning to be attached to these suggestions. Mr Kay is putting forward what he thinks is likely, not what is necessarily best. In his view, fiscal equality would be better served by applying the sort of tax relief available on pensions to other forms of long-term saving. But that is certainly not on the agenda for a revenue-hungry

Gerrard & Capel to seek place in gilts

The company announced yesterday by stockbrokers James Capel, and the the discount house, Gerrard & National. could well set a pattern for others in the City to follow. The company, jointy owned and to be called Gerrard & Capel, will apply to the Bank of England to become an authorized market maker in gilt-edged securities when the new gilts market opens, probably in 1986. No goodwill is involved, and each side will put in as much as is required to meet its own aims and the Bank's requirements. Together the two firms create an operation which alone would not have been possible. To that extent, the true mother of this particular invention really is necessity.

It is expected that only a few dozen organizations will be allowed initially to make a market in gilts. Of those, as many as half may perish under the ferocity of competition, Gerrard, the discount house with the largest turnover, may have expected a ticket to the arena in its own right, but the Capel connextion both strengthens the case for admittance and increases the long-term chances of profitable survival.

Gerrard's expertise at the short end of the gilt market will be added two Capel's broking skills at the long end, and they will be able to share client lists. The device of a joint company has an additional benefit: it puts in place a convincing and durable Chinese wall between the new activity and Capel's traditional agency business. It is a mode which might well be followed in the post-1986 equity market.

A disadvantage of the Gerrard & Capel route is that it places an unwritten but nontheless real constraint on the two partner's freedom of action elsewhere. Capel last month threw in its lot with Honkong Shanghai Banking Corporation. a relationship which is presumably acceptable to Gerrard. But so sensitive is a joint gilts operation that each side might have reservations about further strategic moves by the other.

That apart, the deal has the virtues of simplicity and flexibility. Neither quality has been exactly the sine qua non of some other recent City amalgamations.

Scathing report on gold futures failure

No London commodity exchange has been subjected to so radical, critical and public an analysis as the London Gold Futures Market has received from the hand of Mr John Wolff. His report on the market frankly admits that it has been a failure - a word which outside commentators hitherto have been rebuked for using. No fewer than 27 reasons are listed for the market's flop. Mr Wolff believes that unless "something is done," the members will leave in droves. "In view of the low volume and abysmal atmosphere on the floor, action needs to be taken sooner rather than later".

The market deserves a pat on the back for facing its problems so openly, but a kick in the pants for its failures and previous complacency. If Mr Wolff, takes this view from where his company, Rudolf Wolff, a floor member of the LGFM, is sitting, things must be very bad indeed.

To be fair, the LGFM's average turnover of around 500 contracts a day this year compares favourably with some other London markets, and makes the LGFM second only to New York's Comex. But these comparisons do not really flatter the LGFM. It was intended to be, and should be, much bigger, the absence of a bull market in gold notwithstanding.

The suggested solutions are bold. The market broadly has two choices. It can expand its own operations by adding options and silver contracts and by making trading more attractive to a wider spread of participants. Or it can throw in its lot with another exchange, probably the London International Financial Futures

Although Mr Wolff sensibly cautions against rushing into direct links with American exchanges, his suggestions, if implemented, would mould a market more in the American image. The example of the report and the spirit in which it is offered could mark a turning point for London commodity markets in general, and for the LGFM in particular.

Timely autumn gilts sale by Government Broker yesterday's announcement economic dogma; namely the from the Government Broker other countries will benefit that he has another £300m of index-linked 21st century taplets on the books. Assuming investors' predilection for pure real yield holds upon in the carly part of next week, and the Government Broker sells the stock, then he will have tied up roughly £1 billion-worth of funding. Either the credit counterparts are deteriorating so quickly that he is obliged to market dept in these huge quantities, or the next set of sterling £3m figures will be stunning, and interest rates are set to tumble. We shall see.

Comparisons between world yield curves at the endof August, when the US federal reserve board apparently began casing its credit policy, and now also suggest that the authorities have benefited from an exceptional period of stability in global bond markets.

At the end of August, American short rates, as represented by three-month Treasury bills were 10.63 per cent, while long-term bond yields were 12.70 per cent.

Six weeks of life under a gentler American credit regime has generated remarkably little change. Short term US yields have fallen 70 basis points, and long-term returns have dropped by 55 basis points. Both Britain and Japan sport broadly unchanged yield curves. German short rates at 6.05 per cent have risen 40 points, while long term returns offered have declined by 30 points.

The fluctuations in German yields can be explained away on the grounds that the German central bank authorized the withdrawal of coupon tax, thereby inducing a structural change in the market, while at the same time. West German inflation expectations have improved markedly, even though the Deutche mark has been weak against the dollar. Hence the variations in short and long-term yields.

However, the fact that a change in Fed credit policy can induce a fail in the US yield level, with no alteration in inflation expectations, while simulataneously leaving other countries' yield structure intact

Banking October is building up could, lead investors to questo be quite a month after tion at least one piece of from falling US rates.

Alternatively, world investors may be merely adopting a passive precautionary role ahead of the trickier market conditions looming at the year end. Both Mr Stephen Lewis of Phillips and Drew, and Standard & Poor's Credit Week agree that US rates in the medium-term are far more likely to rise.

Mr Lewis sees the US economy bouncing back in the final quarter, after a third quarter slowdown, while the continued robust growh in personal incomes points to a further pick-up in consumer spending at the end of the year. Credit Week sees both retail and car sales picking up after the summer doldrums, and

Treasury funding programme on the way. ·A pick-up in the US Fed funds rate to perhaps 13 per cent would surprise neither commentator, with the corresponding jump in long yields back to 13.5 per cent. Both moves, if they happen, look bound to jolt the stability of world markets. The Govern-

John Mowlem's 17 per cent fall in interim pretax profits to £3.4m was an unexpected disappointment and the shares slipped 9p to 195p.

The problem seems to have arisen largely from the UK construction side, where margins remain under relentless pressure. In addition, two civil engineering projects fell behind because of difficult weather and ground conditions. The projects are still profitable, but blew Mowlem off course by about £1 m. They may still not feed into second-half profits.

The outcome for the full year, however, has had to be tunes of the figures, there lies pared back from previous expectations of £11.5m against £10.1m in 1983. Given Mowlem's record of consistent profits growth since 1979 and the element of timing in the current setback the shares do not look expensive.

Raybeck

Most of the retailing talk this week has been about success.

Raybeck's figures convey the darker side of the sector.
Interim losses of £2.6m and a near £4m downturn into the red, resulting in a passed dividend come after the group's belated mid-summer discovery that both its Lord John menswear retailing chain and the ladieswear chain Lady and Lord John, had severe management problems, incolving massive stock and marketing difficulties.

Despite the £3.5m or so losses recorded by these two divisions and including the troubled Carnegic subsidiary Raybeck is still not out of the wood. The current six months' trading will also reflect the eccentric purchasing policies of the two chains previous managements. Large lines of tricky stock are still on the books and next spring apparently is the earliest date for shareholders to look for some relief.

On one level, the sudden discovery of these management problems sounds extraordinary. Presumably regular reports were made to head office. But on the level, vesterday's revelations are on a par with the successful but ill-fated £11m bid in 1978 for Bourne & Hollingsworth, the Oxford Street department store: four years later. B&H was closed down:

Thus, behind the misforperhps the more familiar story of a group with good ideas which has shot shead but failed and planning strategies to wider responsibilities. At 24p, down 4p on the day, the shares are virtually option money.

The managers of the top-performing income trust over 7 years introduce

Extra income Trust 7-25% gross yield

Many investments offer a high income, but do not give your capital a chance to grow.

But the new Prolific Extra Income Unit Trust provides a real alternative.

Quite simply, this new Trust's objective is to produce a high and growing income together with capital growth, mainly from the ordinary shares of UK companies.

The right investment balance

To achieve a yield substantially above the average for UK shares as a whole, around 85% of the portfolio will initially be invested in equities and convertibles; the remaining 15% will go into preference shares and other fixed interest securities.

The inclusion of fixed interest investments to enhance the immediate yield, rather than investing in equities alone, is an important aspect of the fund as it gives the Managers the flexibility to select lower yielding equities offering greater prospects for both capital and income growth.

Proven investment management

Prolific's investment team has already used this approach to provide investors with

Why invest now?

The estimated gross starting yield of Prolific Extra Income Trust, at 7.25%, is higher than the likely level of inflation over the foreseeable future. Furthermore, the Managers believe that interest rates in the US will decline over the medium term, leading to lower rates in the UK, and giving a further boost to share prices.

Please remember, however, that the price of units, and the income from them, can go down as well as up, particularly over the short term.

MARKETING

Financial companies lag behind, says study

Finance companies are inept at marketing their products even though greater competition is forcing them to produce more and more financial packages. Banks, building societies and other financial institutions do not target their products or pay enough attention to marketing according to a study by Campbell Keegan, market research consultant.

The study concludes that in many cases the profusion of schemes and financial offers is counter productive consumers become confused. If they were more carefully explained and attractively marketed investors would pay more attention.

The study identifies six types of consumer in the financial field. These range from the person who makes no attempt to understand the choices but hopes for the best to the "wheeler dealer" who uses the system and believes himself to be above it.

Financial companies are worse than most in identifying their audience and adapting their marketing to it, the study

Among married women, some leave all the decisions to their husbands, some take equal responsibility, while in the North of England in particular they often run the family finances. If financial companies paid more attention to the attitudes of women they would be more successful in selling their products, says the study.

Sorting out the priorities behind marriage vows

Proceedings Act 1984 comes into force this week. In the longer term it lights a fuse beneath the whole concept of marriage. But it will probably make little immediate differ-ence to the nitty gritty of financial arrangements after

The main changes affecting financial settlements on divorce

 The interests of the children should have top priority. Divorced wives should be encouraged to be self-sufficient.

 Maintenance can be fixed for a certain number of years and not necessarily indefinitely. • The courts are allowed to order a "clean break" where appropriate, involving a division of capital and no ongoing maintaince. Formerly wives could refuse such an offer.

The new Act still leaves a great deal to the discretion of registrars who are responsible for much of the detail in most settlements. The question is, how will they interpret the new

Mr Paul Collins, of One Parent Families, which has opposed the new Act, said: "It could mean less money for single parents. It's all very well saying you are putting the interests of children first, but the law gives no guidelines on the amount of amintenance to be paid for them. The National Foster Care Association puts the cost of a child at £50 a week. Most maintenance orders are nowhere near that level."

Fears are being voiced that if a marriage breaks down for a voman who may have given up a well-paid job for marriage and children, her chances of claiming that she might have become a high-powered businesswoman are not likely to be accepted in

Mr Roger Carter, a family socicitor with the London firm of Watts. Vallance and Vallance, said: "The new legislation will make very little difference except where there are no children, grown-up offspring."

The solicitors firm of Kenright & Cox has produced a readable booklet. A Simple Guide to Divorce (available free, tel: 01-242 0672). Mr David Davidson, who is with the firm. said: "I think the situation for women with young children will remain unchanged, but the emphasis has altered. As the children get older the courts may expect the wife to make more effort to earn her own

"My situation could easily change in two years from now". Mrs Valentini Brunn told me.

She is divorced with children aged 14 and 21. She represents the category of wives who will be affected by the changes in the new Act. "I earn very little because I am still studying and so my working time amounts to two days a week," she added. She admits to having fears that her husband, who up to now has been very generous with maintenance, might go to the court when the younger daughter is 16 and apply to have the maintenance reduced or abolished altogether.

He former husband remarried and she says that in two years he might find the strain of supporting two households too much.

Miss Susan Fieldman, a solicitor, who runs courses on women and money, recommends that wives keep in touch with the job market. "Marriage is no longer a meal ticket for life - if it ever was. While they are still married. wives should also make sure they have some idea how to run the family finances", she said. It is admitted by One Parent Families that the private main-tenance system has failed, and that only the wealthy can keep their ex-wives as if the marriage had not broken down.

INVESTMENT Where a woman finds help

Almost three times as many men as women, use the financial press as a source of information and useful advice on money, according to a survey carried out by the stockbroking firm of Grieveson

Grant, Bank managers are more popular with men than women with almost 20 per cent more men using the bank manager for advice on financial matters.

Grieveson Grant surveyed about 600 of its clients and found some interesting differences between male and female investors.

The level of Stock Exchange investments is perhaps the most striking with the women outstripping men consistently.
About 82 per cent of female investors held stock exchange investments worth more than £50.000 compared with 75 per cent of men. In the £50,000 to £200.000 range the percentages were 67 and 51 respectively.

Midland Bank announced this week that it will offer free banking to all retired people aged over 55 who keep their account in credit.

It will also provide a package of concessions and benefits. including free financial advice and reduction on Thomas Cook holidays, for retired people who save enough with the Midland. Some building societies and insurance companies also offer special packages for older or retired people. These include cheaper car insurance, mortgages where you only pay interest, and schemes for borrowing on a mortgage to buy

The other elements of Midland's Retirment Service are open to those over 55, (either retired or within six months or retirement) who open a highinterset cheque account and deposit at least £2,000, the minimum balance allowed on this account, which pays market-related rates.

The other perks are reductions of up to £75 on some Thomas Cook holiday and guidbook on retirement.

Among other financial institutions many of the big building societies will already provide interest only mortgages for older people. Putting record straight on endowment mortgages

From Mr Hugh Scurfield Saturday's Family Money page cushion of security. concerning the relative merits of straight repayment mortgages and those repaid by a low-cost endowment insurance policy.

There is a strong and valid argument in favour of the endowment plan even during periods of high mortgage rates. The additional yearly cost is only some 5 per cent, while the cash surplus available after repaying a 25-year loan would. on the basis of current Norwich Union pay-outs, be more than 60 per cent of the loan.

Such a large margin clearly demonstrates the advantages of an endowment plan from a good bonus paying office. Even though the proceeds of the policy are not all guaranteed. the building societies usually Norwich Union Li take no more than 80 per cent Insurance Society.

The article itself referred to the extraordinarily favourable returns currently produced by endowment insurance and at Norwich Union we believe that we shall be repeating these returns in the future. What concerns us is the policy of some companies in forecasting 30-40 per cent more than they are currently paying out.

I bring these two points to your attention because your article misquotes Norwich Union and reaches conclusions which we believe to be mistaken.

ECONOMIC GROWTH PROSPECTS FOR THE SUNRISE ECONOMIES

The countries in which we propose to invest have, with good reason, been called survise economies.

Their immediate past performance is impressive. We believe their future is likely to be even more so.

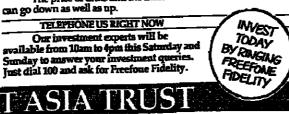

Given the diversity of opportunity provided by both existing and emerging economies, the potential for major long term capital growth, an aggressive investment policy, and Fidelity's excellent track record in the Far East, we believe the prospects look bright for investors in Fidelity South East Asia Trust.

The new trust may at times exhibit a degree of volatility but, given the long term growth prospects of the SE Asia region, we believe it should form an integral part of any serious investor's growth portfolio. INITIAL FIXED PRICE OFFER

Until last month his knowledge of England was limited to one visit to London. He had never watched an English match and he spoke hardly a word of the learnings. hardly a word of the language. At the age of 30 he was happily settled with his wife and two children in a luxurious house in Alsace, which his whole family adored. When asked why he made such sacrifices to come to England to play for Aston Villa, Six has a standard reply: "Je suis Although many modern day professionals are happy to sell their talents abroad, few have quite the record of Six, a troubadour who has spent 14 years entertaining crowds around the football showgrounds of western Europe. He has played for five French clubs - Valenciennes, Lens, Marseilles, Strasbourg and Mulhouse – and for Stuttgart in West Germany and Cercle Bruges in Belgium.

England was not his first choice this summer when Mulhouse, a second division club, decided they could no longer afford him. He would have preferred to stay in France but, even after playing a prominent role in his country's European championship success (he played in three out of five matches) and showing that he had lost none of his skill and vision, no French club took him on. Six probably paid the price for the reputation earned earlier in his career as the "enfant terrible" of French football. He has been regarded as moody and difficult to handle. He has rarely stayed long in one place and his club career has hardly paralleled his success at international level, where he has won 52 caps and played in two World Cups.

Three of his French chibs Lens and Marseilles - were relegated while he was with them. The Marseilles crowd even barracked him this summer when he played in the European championship semi-final against "The best part of my career was with Stuttgart in Germany," he said. "What I enjoyed there and have found in England too is that there is less mental pressure on players. I've been amazed here how players only have to arrive for games a couple of hours before kick-off. In France they bring the team together the day before a game and watch over you so closely that they even tell you what you can and can't eat. The match is the only thing in your head, and that is not always a good thing."

Six, who made an immediate impact last week in his Villa debut against Manchester United (which was his first competitive match since the European Championship), acknowledges that few foreign players succeed in England. "It's a special type of football here," he said.

"I've already notice that it's more physical, although I was used to that in Germany. It's also much faster and because of that there are more mistakes. I think it would be very difficult for a foreign player to succeed here in midfield or at centre-forward, but as a winger I think I will find

Six, who travels with Villa to Everton this afternoon, was not selected by Henri Michel, France's new manager, for today's World Cup qualifying game against Luxembourg but believes he could still play a valuable role in the national side as they look towards the 1986 World Cup. "I am about the same age as players like Platini, Tigana, Bossis and Battiston, and experience is crucial at international level," he said. "We probably lost against West Germany in the 1982 World Cup semi-final because of inexperience. If the World Cup had been played this year we would have won it.

BADMINTON

A shadow over partners

Nora Perry's famous partnership with Thomas Kihlstrom, which won he world title last year and the World Cup last month, looks like world Cup last month, looks like ending. Two defeats in two days at the Masters, sponsored by British Airways, in Portsmouth have brought matters to a head.

The player who has done more than any other to keep England at the forefront of world badminton since the 1970s is giving herself one last season at the top. Time is therefore short and after yesterday's ominous defeat in three games by the Anglo-Scottish combination of Gillian Gowers and Billy Gilliland she spoke her mind.

"Why should the selectors pick me with a foreign player and lose a place for an England player when we are not achieving world-wide results? I'd go along with that", she said. "Just because we have done something in the past doesn't mean we will play with each other again" was her assessment of the state of affairs between her and the 35-yearattars between her and the 35-yearold Stockholm chiropractor, who a year ago was probabaly the world's outstanding doubles player but who has been some way beow that since njuries afflicted him last year.

This means speculation will began about a new partner -Gilliland is one possibility. Yet it was only a few weeks ago that she ended another famous long-stand-ing pairing with Jane Webster, which won the world women's doubles title in 1979, and the new one with Gill Clark has not yet properly coalesced. Yesterday this partnership, too, foundered, by 6-15, 15-11, 15-12, to the Anglo-Danish combination of Helen Troke and Kirsten Larsen.

It is a long time since the 30-yearold Mrs Perry was beaten three times in the early stages of a tournament and that, in a world championship season, is the last thing she would have wanted. She had, however, her first baby earlies in the year and has just recovered from a stomach injury and 10-day lay off. So she has her excuses and if any player has the bubble and bounce needed to recover it is she.

The Buckinghamshire team, captained by Sutinder Khehar, contains 10 players from Stough, the odd man out being Blaze D'Souza, at right back. The Middlesex defence will be confronted by a powerful forward line made up of Laly, Kali Saini, Bhaji Flora, who finished top of the southern division last season, are reinforced by Potte and Kulbir Bhaura from the Great Britain squad and no doubt have the best-laid schemes to prevent another Bucks Fizz.

In praise of the old master in the loft

SIDELINES Gordon Allan

One of the most remarkable men I have known died not lone ago. He was wrapped up in sport in one way or another all his life. His name is irrelevant. Few readers of this newspaper will have come across him, but in spite of - I would prefer to say because of - that fact, he deserves a word or two here. I first knew him as a schoolmaster. He never taught me regularly and my clearest recollection of that time, during the last war, is of being hauled up in front of him for playing trant, for which he let me off with a caution. The years passed. I left school, and eventually home, and lost contact with him. When by chance I began to meet him again he had retired from schoolmastering and turned to part-time sports journalism, which suited his restless nature. He had no formal training for the work, but he knew and loved sport in a score of its manifestations, and made a small, enjoyable living. He won university Blues, at athletics, cricket, football swimming and water polo, one of them at Cambridge. He played cricket for a Scottish county, some reserve games for a first division football club, ran a first division football club, ran the marathon and sprinted. Once, in his sixties, he turned out for a midweek rugby team when they were short. Every year if possible he came from the far north to Lord's for a Test match. To the end of his days her was a rugby coach to small boys, and a swimmer.

Painting the picture in the gallery

He wrote mostly about rugby and cricket, in a sober, factual style in which could be heard choes of the classroom. When I returned home on holiday be would meet me for coffee in the art gallery, bring me up to date on the local sporting intelli-gence, and, with gusto and humour, recount his latest journalistic exploits, mistakes and all.

The gusto and humon wer needed. At the kind of grounds he frequented there were no press boxes, no programmes, often no shelter or telephones a lack of amenities that would drive some pampered Fleet Street hacks to apoplexy. He had to dig for the simplest information and rely on au old friend, a 1914-18 veteran, to

"ran" his copy. He used to call himself a Peter Pan, and it was a fair and interested. His approach to life and sport was boyish, omnivorous, sociable, humble, without cynicism or rancour. Had it been otherwise, I doubt somehow whether he would have lived as long or done as

Shortly after his death, I visited his widow. She was at a loss to know what to do with his vast accumulation of sporting memorabilia strewn around the loft. We climbed up a ladder to look and she told me I could

Allerlea can climb right to the top Opale leads Pirate Lass rewards

By Mandaria (Michael Phillips)

With A Kinsman, W Six Times, Allerica, and Hello Dandy, the Grand National here will be no better spectacle today than the Timeform Chasers and Hurdlers Handicap Chase at Ayr. That could not be more appropriate, as it coincides with the publication of the annual of the same name, which has just appeared on the bookshelves, to the delight of those who are looking forward to another winter's jumping I can think of no better way to refresh the mind and brush up on general matters in the world of National Hunt racing after a summer spent Flat racing than to thumb one's way through the pages of this exquisitely compiled annual, which definitely has no equal.

Enen before Hello Dandy won this Ayr race 12 months ago, the men of Timeform were predicting that he can also win the Grand National. How right they were. Now they are suggesting that he is sure to play a leading role in next year's Aintree epic, provided that he gets the top of the ground conditions that he relishes.

As far as today's race is concerned, though, I prefer Allerien (nap), who is described in the annual as a very useful chaser in the making. That might even be an understatement, because Allerlea was alongside the brilliant but illfated Noddy's Ryde when he made a costly mistake jumping the second-last fence of the London and Northern Group Future Champions Novices Chase at Ayr last April. Yet he was still beaten only four lengths at the end.

Having won over two miles some of the spoils. Boezinge is Flying Childers Stakes at Donas well as over three last season, Alleriea is clearly versatile. He is also in form again now after his summer's rest, having won his first race of the current season at Kelso a week ago when he broke the course record by more than two seconds. A Kinsman, who won the Sun Alliance Steeplechase by a sied margin at Cheltenham last March, the recent Huntingdon winner W Six Times and, of course, Hello Dandy constitute tough opposition for my nap. but I doubt any of them being

Alydar's Best to fly high

From Desmond Stoneham

Alydar's Best is my selection for Angar's best is my selection for tomorrow's Grand Criterium at Longchamp, but the filly will not be declared a definite runner until this morning. Unfortunately, the plane bringing Alydar's Best over from Ireland on Friday had to return to base, because of bad weather and a technical fault, so the filly finally arrived in France after a journey of more than five hours. David O'Brien will breeze Alydar's Best at Chantilly this morning before making his declaration to run. In her only race. Alydar's Best easily won the group three Silken Glider Stakes and that form should be good enough to win the one mile Grand Criterium.

River Drummer is highly rated by François Boutin and this colt could be the runner-up.

The Aga Khan's Euliya is ... preferred in the group three Prix de Royallieu where the places may be filled by Reine de Grace and Reine d'Egypte.

Before Lord Lane, Lord Chief Justice, Mr Justice Stuart-Smith and Mr Justice Leggatt [Judgment delivered October 12]

A condition of bail that a striking coal miner charged with an offence under the Public Order Act 1936 should "not visit any premises or place for the purpose of preketing or demonstrating in connection with the current trade dispute between the National Union of Mineworkers and National Coal Board other than and National Coal ocer train peacefully to picket or demonstrate at his usual place of employment" was properly imposed. Justices should ask themselves the simple question whether the condition they sought to impose was necessary for sought to impose was necessary for the prevention of the commission of an offence by the defendant when on bail, and in considering that question they were entitled to use their knowledge of events at local collieries during the preceding weeks.

reserved judgment and dismissed applications by nine miners. Mr Stephen James Sharkey. Mr Peter David Hunt. Mr Geoffrey Barron, Mr Brian Fretwell. Mr Paul Robmson. Mr Martin Swatten, Mr Graham Paul Fellows. Mr John Grove and Mr James George Anderson, for judicial review of the justices' order imposing a condition Justices' order imposing a condition on the grant of bail.

Mr John Macdonald, QC and Mr James Wood for the applicants; Mr Brian Appleby, QC and Miss Alexandra Scott for the prosecutor. Mr John Laws as amicus curiae.

delivering the judgment of the court, said that the question which the justices should ask themselves was a simple one: was that condition necessary for the prevention of the commission of an offence the the defendant when on bail? by the defendant when on bail? They were not obliged to have substantial grounds. It was enough if they perceived a real and not a fanciful risk of an offence being committed. Section 3(6) and paragraph 8 of schedule 1 to the Bail Act 1976 gave the court a wide discretion to inquire whether the discretion was necessary. That discretion was only limited by the principle enunciated in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corporation ([1948] 1

It was conceded that there was no requirement for formal evidence to be given. It was sufficient for the facts to be related to the justices at second hand by a police officer. The nub of the problem was how far, if at all, the justices were entitled to have regard to what was described by counsel as the matrix of events which brought the defendants entitled to use their knowledge of likelihood of their committing events at local collieries during public order offences when on bail. preceeding weeks, because it was (inter alia) that they could properly reach a conclusion as to the necessity of imposing a condition.

For months before the justices reached their decisions, a bitter dispute had raged, and it still raged, between the NUM and the NCB.

cease work and come out on strike. That they had endeavoured to achieve by descending on working colleries in order to prevent the men employed at those colleries from going to work.

It must have been obvious to the justices that the defendants would, if released unconditionally on ball, have resumed their picketing activities at the first opportunity. That much in effect was conceded.

There was nothing criminal in bodies of men, even large bodies of men, congregating together to carry out lawful activities. What was not lawful was for bodies of men of oregather in order to prevent others; who wished to work from working by means of intimidation, by threats of violence or by violence itself.

Whatever offences, common law or statutory, might be committed in those cases, there was no need to go beyond section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936.

By the time the defendants appeared in court, it must have been clear to the justices that any suggestion of picketing by intimidation and threat. It must have been obvious to all those participating in the picketing that their presence in large numbers was part of the intimidation and threats it must have been clear to them that their presence would, at the least encourage others to threats and/or violence even if they themselves said nothing.

One of the first requirements of any civilised society was that their presence would, at the least encourage others to threats and/or violence even if they themselves said nothing.

One of the first requirements of any civilised society was that their presence would are unseed that their presence one to be discouraged.

One of the first requirements of any civilised society was that bullying should not succeed, that mere physical strength or strength of numbers should not be permitted to correct the weaker or fewer in number. That requirement was exemplified inter alia by the common law offence of assault. An assault was any act by which the defendant intentionally or recklessly caused the victim to apprehend immediate unlawful violence. There was no need for n to proceed to was important to remember that.

Where large numbers of pickets relevant considerations they could assembled with the intention of trying to prevent working miners similar condition on any grant of from going to work by threats of bail, violence and the force of numbers. there was no doubt that each of the picketing miners who proved to be a party to such intimidation was guilty of at least an offence under section 5 of the Public Order Act.

Against that background, the justices were right to conclude that if no condition were imposed, offences would be committed by the defendants whilst on bail. They were right to conclude therefore that such a condition was necessary.

The individual circumstances of each defendant were not material save in so far as they showed, that unless restrained, each defendant would rejoin the mass picketing operation at the first opportunity. The fact that they were men of good character, and other personal fore the court. Character and other personal The answer was that they were considerations did not affect the There was ample material before the justices on which they could reach their conclusion. They took relevant considerations into account and did not have regard to anything

There was no doubt that in 90 per cent or more of the cases before them the justices acceded to the submission of the police that the conditions should be imposed. It
